Dr. Abbott made a timely appeal for the discussion of great national questions without vituperation and with mutual respect for each others' opinions. He considered that all our great religious problems today are problems of brotherhood and reduce themselves chiefly to two: first, how shall the churches of all types work together for a common end, and, second, how shall the church, broadly speaking, become a church for the common people. Dr. Abbott's peroration was an eloquent description of what constitutes a Christian nation. Its essence, in his thought, consists not in the greatness of material resources, but in the prevalence of righteousness and in the permeation of society with the spirit of Christ.

THE HISTORICAL SURVEY.

It was foreordained that the senior secretary of the association, Rev. Dr. M. E. Strieby, who has served as secretary since 1864, and was the intimate friend of the founders of the association, should write and read the historical survey. In it he recalled to mind the heroism and generosity of men whom the world is prone to forget, but whom historians of the anti-slavery contest can never overlook. Arthur and Lewis Tappan, Joshua Leavitt, Theodore Weld, Josiah Brewer—father of Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court—George Whipple were noble men, ahead of their time. The men and women who went out as the first missionaries to the blacks and whites of the slave and border States took their lives in their hands. The Civil War brought new problems and greater financial support and sympathy from the North. In due time the association was indorsed by the National Council. From receipts of $11,328 the first year they have mounted to as high as $429,949 in 1892, and the total receipts of the fifty years have aggregated over $11,500,000, exclusive of the magnificent gift of $1,000,000 by Mr. Daniel Hand and his legacy of $500,000 more. The work expands. There are 8,000,000 blacks today where there were 4,000,000 in 1865. Caste prejudice is still rife, and the association intends to continue to oppose it as resolutely as it has in the past.

THE INDIAN.

The greater part of Wednesday morning was devoted to the Indian. No one was so well fitted to tell of the need and promise of this phase of the A. M. A. activities as Rev. A. L. Riggs, D. D., for so many years the honored and devoted friend of the red men. His hopeful, inspiring outlook, his earnest assurance that the period of indifference has passed, that Christianity is now an established native power, gave his hearers fresh courage and perseverance. One of the most picturesque figures of the convention was the pleasant-faced, intelligent young Dakota Indian, Mr. Arthur Tebbetts, who pleaded for his people in creditable English, declaring that, "We are ready to receive the Word of God, we are ready to adopt the civilized life, we are ready to take hold of missionary work, we are ready to lead the children to a higher step, but first we want American rights, American education and the gospel." Dr. Henry Hopkins presented in his able, thoughtful address the brighter side of the Indian question. He argued that the wholesale arraignment of the white race in regard to their treatment of the red men is not just and recalled historic instances to prove that the Indian has always had true friends among the white men. Dr. Hopkins declared that the outlook now is more hopeful than ever before. Government has been converted and is doing work meet for repentance. The Indian Bureau is efficiently administered. The Indian Civil Service is at last free from politics. The system of Government schools is broadening and constantly improving. Now Christian environment should become a watchword of Christian missions and the Indian must be defended and assisted in his transformation from the old to the new. The red man needs the English language and contact with the right kind of white man. He should not be treated as an Indian among Indians but as a man among men.

THE CHINESE.

The work among the Chinese on the Pacific Coast who have fallen to the care of the A. M. A. found an earnest advocate in Rev. J. H. Twitchell. He emphasized the peculiar difficulties and discouragements of this mission, touched upon its methods of evening schools, street preaching and house to house visitation among Chinese women and girls, and dwelt particularly upon the willingness and earnest desire of the Chinese to evangelize their countrymen. The proof of discipleship of those who have been received into the Christian household is found in the flourishing enterprises in Canton and Hong Kong, supported by the California Chinese Christians. They have spent more than $15,000 on the plant of this mission in China aside from the $2,000 annually contributed towards its running expenses. "The work in California bespeaks our succor with the force of a double appeal," said Mr. Twitchell in closing, "for the blessing it seeks to minister on our own soil it is worthy, and it is a door through which a blessing promises to pass forth into the wider world."

WORK AMONG THE HIGHLANDERS.

Rev. Dr. James Brand of Oberlin, as one near the field and conversant with the problem, and Prof. J. C. Campbell of the school at Joppa, Ala., and Rev. W. G. Olinger of Williamsburg, Ky., set forth the state of the work among this interesting people—its encouragements and discouragements, of which the former outnumber the latter.

Dr. Brand characterized the American Highlanders as a hermit nation in the heart of this republic, victims of two forces, the devilhood of slavery and the law of nature which kept them in the mountains to which slavery drove them. They want fair play and opportunity. They want what has made Massachusetts and Ohio great—schools for their children and a gospel of love for their souls—to awaken their intellects and aspirations and to make one of the noblest elements of natural strength.

THE WORK AMONG THE NEGROES.

The two speakers representing the Negro race, laboring under the association's direction in the South, chanced to be graduates of the same school, Talladega, and from the same State, Alabama. Rev. James Brown of Anniston described fearlessly the dark side of the work in the city and especially in the country churches, and pleaded for a continuation of the gifts of Northern friends and the extension of the association's work. Rev. J. R. Savage, a teacher for ten years and the conductor of teachers' institutes for three years, gave his theory of the proper education of the Negro. His entire speech was phenomenal in its diction, and some of his epigrams called forth applause. Such, for instance, as: "Education is the remedy, and enough of the right kind will cure. By reason of his low condition his treatment may need to begin below the lowest, but for the same reason it should extend as high as the highest."

A COMPOSITE PHOTOGRAPH.

The program Wednesday evening was well arranged to attract a great popular audience, and it proved successful. The Berkeley Temple Quartet in the choir and the Fisk Jubilee Singers on the platform vied with each other in producing strains sweet, solemn, inspiring, which made the listeners long for more. A synthetic view of the work of the association was presented by representatives of the four races to whose uplifting its efforts are directed. Mr. Yong Kay, earnest, Biblical, loyal to his people, told what Christian Chinamen are doing in this country to bring their fellows to Christ and how great is their interest in their brethren in their own land. Rev. A. C. Garner of Texas, formerly a member of the Fisk Jubilee Singers, with shining black face, spoke for his race with genuine eloquence and quaint humor. He told of plantations where the only difference between this and ante-bellum days is that then the owner owned his slaves while now they belong to him. His plea was, "Give us the stuff which makes men—education."

Rev. W. W. Dorman of Tennessee described the Mountain Whites of that section. They have, he thought, religion enough, such as it is. They have been evangelized to death. They have their own ideas and ideals of Christian life. But these are fixed and unprogressive and of a low type. The hope of successful work is among the children and youth, and here, also, the great need is Christian education. Mr. Arthur Tebbetts of the Cannon Ball Indian Mission, North Dakota, told of his own life, of the idolatry in which he had been trained, of his desire to do good to his race and of the progress they are making through the help of the association.

JUSTICE BREWER'S ADDRESS.

Following the ten-minute speeches, which the president found some difficulty in keeping within the prescribed limits, came the principal address of the evening by Justice David J. Brewer of the United States Supreme Court. It was an oration so finished in diction and so illuminated by imagination as to be almost a poem. Justice Brewer began with a vivid picture of Christ's address on the last judgment, whose great test was, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." This was the divine interpretation of life and duty. Every one who needs us, of whatever race, is our brother. The Indian, who once roamed the land undisturbed, has for two and a half centuries appealed to the piety and avarice of the white man. Alcohol and powder have combined to drive him from the face of the earth. The gospel invitation has at last been given him to lift him to Christian civilization and citizenship. The African has been forced from his native land to turn soil into money for American Christians, and for a long time the return of Onesimus seemed to be the most important event recorded in the New Testament. The almond-eyed Celestial—the walls with which his empire has been encircled for ages having been broken down—was invited to come and build for us a great transcontinental railway. He is here with his unknown habits and unknown potencies. So by virtue of an earlier right, or through our compulsion or at our solicitation, the three despised races are among us—races whom to wrong is for so many a habit, whom to plunder and oppress is held to be just because of our greed and their weakness. For fifty years this society has gloried, and still glories, in the mission to those whom the avarice and ambition of the nation have despised and forgotten. The work of this society will not be finished till the Indian, the Negro and the Chinaman cease to be despised races. We hope for the future of our nation because through our civilization runs the strong, rich thought of Christian duty and Christian service. By the gospel of Christ, the power of Christian education and the loyalty of Christian fellowship, the children of Japheth, Ham and Shem may be made to walk together in the realization of the full brotherhood of man

Notwithstanding the interruptions which suburban trains intrude into Boston evening audiences, the departures were few, by far the larger part of the great assembly remaining intent listeners to the end of the address.

THE SOUTHERN BISHOP'S MESSAGE.

They develop orators in the South. Often they are too florid to suit our Northern standards, but even when so they have a dash and power to stir the emotions which is peculiar. Bishop C. V. Galloway, D. D., of the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church, who came to bear the salutations of Southern Christians to the A. M. A., combines many of the best characteristics of Southern and Northern orators. He is intense but judicial, capable of flights of the imagination but ballasted with good sense that prevents him from soaring too high. As he said, twenty-five years ago neither he nor his message would have been tolerated by a Boston audience, but time has mellowed the North and the South as his message and its reception proved. It was thrilling to hear him say that it is foolish to canonize men who labor for the blacks in Africa and ostracize those who labor for them in America; to hear him insist "that the Negro should have equal opportunity with every American citizen to fulfill in himself the highest purposes of an all-wise and beneficent Providence"; to witness his indignant spurning of the idea that the deportation and colonization of the Negro are to solve the problem; and it was gratifying to hear him say that the best people of the South are appreciating now the work of the A. M. A., and are giving to its workers their friendship, not their condescending approval. Perhaps this is so in Mississippi, but it is not so in Georgia and elsewhere in the South, and the bishop must pardon the Northern friends of the A. M. A. and the workers in the field if they question the accuracy of his information on this subject. But all can rejoice in his disposition to recognize worth wherever he sees it, and all can testify unreservedly to the nobility of the message he delivered and the profound impression it produced.

GREETINGS FROM SISTER SOCIETIES.

A pleasant feature of the Thursday morning session was the cordial greetings from our other Congregational missionary societies. Dr. G. M. Boynton, in speaking for the S. S. and P. S., called attention to the fact that this society has given aid to about 100 A. M. A. churches and a large number of mission schools, while the two organizations have common representatives in the South. Rev. L. H. Cobb, D. D., of the C. C. B. S. congratulated the A. M. A. on its magnificent educational work, as also did Hon. Thomas Weston, who spoke in behalf of the C. E. S. The C. H. M. S. was represented by Dr. Kincaid, who reviewed some of the thrilling events of anti-slavery days, and the American Board had a worthy spokesman in Dr. E. B. Webb. One or two bright stories, a bit of sound advice in regard to raising the debt and a significant allusion to the cordial relations between the home and the foreign society manifested in their interchange of missions were features of his effective and entertaining address.

DR. GLADDEN AND DR. MCKENZIE.

If Dr. Storrs and Senator Hoar were to fail the audience the substitution for them of Dr. Gladden and Dr. McKenzie could hardly have been bettered. And the splendid audience which filled the Temple to overflowing found its disappointment giving way to satisfaction as the addresses proceeded.

Dr. Gladden's theme was the Sociological Aspects of A. M. A. Work. He spoke with more than wonted animation and his paper was marked by that fairness and comprehensiveness of view that characterizes all of Dr. Gladden's spoken or written utterances. It was not, on the whole, a very optimistic picture which he drew of the present condition of the colored race, but it was one gained through careful study of the facts and was fortified by citations from eminent authorities. He felt, of course, that a great gain was registered when slavery was abolished, but thought, also, that the tendency of the present unrestricted competitive industrial system was to drive many of the blacks into a condition not much above that of servitude. This being the case, all the more reasons existed for meeting the problem with the best and wisest agencies. The doctor was especially emphatic in his insistence of the point that immediate and vigorous grappling with the problem was the imperative thing. Indeed the last words of his address were, "Now is the day of salvation."

Through Dr. McKenzie's forty five minute address ran occasional threads of humor and even satire as respects the tendency to estimate the results of religious work by statistics. This method he seems to abominate for himself, and dwelt upon the power that inheres when a few souls or even one soul comes in contact with Jesus Christ. Personally he did not care so much for splendid edifices, since log schoolhouses with chinks between the logs ample enough to admit the eternal glory might become nurseries of strong, pure lives. Everything depends on realizing what Christ meant when he said, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." In the course of his address Dr. McKenzie paid a merited and beautiful tribute to Rev. M. E. Strieby, D. D., "our St Simeon" who, now that he has seen Indians and blacks coming to the light, is ready to sing his Nunc Dimittis. The conclusion of the address was a vivid and brilliant delineation of the New Jerusalem, the foundations of which are being laid here by such earnest, consecrated workers as are laboring on missionary ground.

THE FANEUIL HALL RALLIES.

They reasoned and planned well who arranged for the noon rallies in Faneuil Hall on Wednesday and Thursday. Hon. Messrs. S. B. Capen and Arthur Wellman presided on the respective days with dignity, and set the keynote of patriotic enthusiasm high. It was worth the discomfort of a long journey and all its expense simply to hear the audience, led by the Jubilee Quartet, sing America, while their rendering of Julia Ward Howe's Battle Hymn of the Republic set the blood coursing and made the heart swell and the eyes suffuse.

Dr. R. R. Meredith, with characteristic intensity, denounced the spirit of compromise with slavery which caused all of our national woe preceding and during the Civil War; and his diagnosis of present day conditions, owing to compromise with silver and what is practically unrestricted immigration, seemed to strike the crowd as accurate and timely, for it applauded lustily. Dr. Alexander McKenzie dwelt felicitously on the cost of our liberties, the inevitability that all of our national blessings should be costly, and pointed out the peculiar, unprecedented task which we as a people face when we attempt to weld together so many diverse races. Both of these speakers, of course, paid just tribute to the A. M. A. as the agent of God diffusing intelligence and moral standards, Dr. Meredith eulogizing it as the society whose chief glory was its refusal to compromise when compromise was popular at the North.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale's talk was like himself, sui generis. At home on the platform where he stood, full of reminiscences of many of the great men whose portraits looked down upon him as he spoke, and teeming with memories of other notable gatherings of American patriots in Faneuil Hall, he did as he pleased and said what he felt. Perhaps all that he said was not politic, and perhaps some of it was partisan, provincial and sectional, but it was shrewd, humorous and provocative of thought always. You realized that there stood before you a man who had made history as well as recorded it. Homely in person and homely in wit, American through and through, he is the best incarnation today of the old New England intelligence and spirit.

Dr. Quint's reminiscence of pro-slavery and anti-slavery Boston, his description of Anthony Burn's deportation, his reminiscences of scenes in the Civil War and his conversations with the eminent dead, were all most instructive and appropriate for the hour. They made history live. They gave additional meaning to the environment. They formed the natural introduction to words of praise for the association that was organized to alleviate the evils of slavery and create sentiment demanding its abolition.

There were great moments at these meetings, the memory of which will long abide. Lincoln, Sumner, Andrew, Wilson and Burlingame seemed to smile in benediction as they gazed down from their portraits, and Webster even looked as if he bitterly regretted his 7th of March speech, and knew now that compromise was futile.

DR. HIATT'S ADDRESS.

Faneuil Hall was not the only place where the patriotic bearings of the work aroused enthusiasm. In his eloquent morning address in Tremont Temple Rev. C. W. Hiatt, D. D., said the four figures which have been our nation's glory are the Pilgrim Father, the Abolitionist, the Union Soldier and the fair and fragile American Girl who has left her home of luxury to mix the leaven into the sodden mass of human need. "There is the eulogy of the A. M. A." said Dr. Hiatt "and there is the glory of woman." We have learned through the efforts of this association some important lessons. There is such a thing as the brotherhood of man. There has long been such a theory but now it has been demonstrated in black and white and red and yellow. We have discovered that not assassination nor deportation but elevation is the way to get rid of the Negro and we have learned that the true pledge of civilization is a varied industry. Every school in the South is teaching that. The missionary has not realized what he has done. He has taken this parallel of Plymouth Rock and has bent it down below Mason and Dixon's line. He has all unconsciously been wrapping the cross with the stars and stripes, and teaching the Negro that the stripes stand for the stripes by which he is healed and the stars for the Bright and Morning Star.

DR STORRS'S CONTRIBUTION.

Though it came in the form of a letter rather than in a speech, as had been expected up to Wednesday evening, the salutation of Dr. Storrs bore unmistakable marks of his deep personal interest in the A. M. A., his familiarity with its history from the very start and his confidence that it was raised up by God to fulfill a great purpose. The letter, covering nine or ten pages closely written in the doctor's own hand, was not the less beautiful and finished because composed rapidly in the midst of the trying circumstances that detained him from the meeting. It was finely read by his intimate friend, Dr. Lyman, whose delivery suggested to more than one person in the audience Dr. Storrs's own style of platform speech. An extract will reveal the general tenor of the letter, which began by adverting to the foreseeing and far-reaching scheme of that divine Providence by which the association was brought to its birth at a time and under circumstances of which hardly any who may be with you can retain a clearer recollection than mine. I knew and honored many of the men engaged in founding the society. . . . They were in many ways extraordinary men. . . . But there was evidently among them an unseen Presence wiser than they—the silent and mighty tread of One who sees the end from the beginning, who moved them to a work of vaster issues than they foresaw and under whose inspiring impulse they "builded better than they knew." . . . Suppose that when slavery went down with a crash there had been in the land no institution, religious, educational, philanthropic in its aim, commanding the confidence of great Christian communities in the East and the West—no institution accustomed to labor among the colored people and able to command means and men for the vastly enlarged extension of the work—how must the moral civilization of the suddenly liberated African race have been disastrously postponed and the perils of the critical situation have been frightfully augmented.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S RALLY.

Missions have always had a strong message for Christian Endeavor, and the courageous response has not been wanting. The bond between the A. M. A. and Congregational young people was strengthened at the special Christian Endeavor meeting Wednesday night, and, although the meeting was simultaneous with the great Tremont Temple gathering, Park Street Church was well filled. The large congregation, made up mostly of young people, was fired to "hallelujah" enthusiasm by Secretary Baer, who presided and aroused his hearers to a full appreciation of the good work of the speakers, the C. E. chorus and the jubilee singers. Dr. Wallace Nutting of Providence spoke first, confining his thought to the rule of the few as more powerful than the majority, thus illustrating the possibilities of Christian Endeavor in the world. Rev. G. W. Moore, Miss M. C. Collins and Rev. W. G. Olinger brought greetings from the Negroes, Indians and poor whites, and Rev. C. E Jefferson closed the evening with a forcible jubilee address, which carried the sympathizers of the A. M. A. into the future while still reviewing the past as merely the work of "the early morning."

THE WOMAN'S MEETING.

So it was called, since its speakers were women and the report presented concerned the Woman's Bureau, but the great audience Thursday afternoon contained its usual proportion of gentlemen, and although the raising of the jubilee fund postponed its beginning for more than an hour, in size, in interest, in enthusiasm, in spirited, telling addresses, with effective illustrations and unhackneyed presentation of facts, the women's meeting was pronounced one of the most successful sessions of the convention. A thoughtful, uplifting Bible reading on an incident in David's life, by Mrs. C. L. Goodell, gave a spiritual tone to the meeting at the outset. Miss D. E. Emerson's report, which was both well written and effectively presented, was full of interesting historical facts regarding the part which woman has had in the work of the A. M. A. during the past fifty years, from the early female anti slavery societies down to the present year when 392 women have been on its missionary staff. Since the organization of the Woman's Bureau in 1883, $229,600 have been contributed by women's societies.

A remarkably fine paper on the work of women for the anti-slavery cause before the war, by Miss Susan Hayes Ward, met with appreciation on all sides. Enthusiasm was roused when she held up the honored names of the brave and noble wives and mothers, women writers and public speakers and teachers who were stanch friends of Negroes when that meant peril and obloquy. Mrs. E. R. Dorsett, principal of a mountain white school in North Carolina, besought help for mothers and daughters of our American highlanders, untidy, degraded, illiterate, uncouth in dialect, deficient in imagination, living in homes of poverty and squalor. One of the most vigorous and forceful addresses of the entire convention was Miss Anna L. Dawes's appeal for the Indian. "By far the most important view is the missionary one," she said, with characteristic emphasis. "Whatever he may have needed before he needs now the missionary. All that can be done in the large has been done; now the work must be done in detail. Congress cannot make the Indian industrious and faithful, nor give him impetus to start in a better life. Congress cannot show a woman how to change the tepee into a home. This is what the missionary and the missionary alone can do." Coming as it did after the afternoon business session, there was not time for all the speakers scheduled, but Thursday evening there was an opportunity to hear Miss M. C. Collins speak on her Indian work, and to listen to an impressive address from Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer. She showed how great the opportunity is for service, how rich are the compensations of the work for the New England girl with sound health, buoyant faith, cheery optimism, fine education and religious fervor, who goes forth as a missionary of the A. M. A., or, indeed, into any difficult missionary field.

SYMPATHY FOR THE ARMENIANS.

Inspired so to do by Dr. William Hayes Ward, who introduced the resolution, the association on Wednesday evening passed unanimously the following resolutions, which were also emphatically reindorsed at the Faneuil Hall meeting the next day, thanks to Dr. Edward Everett Hale's intervention and characteristic speech. Those who passed these resolutions feel profoundly that this is no time for red tape and formalism to aid in sending back to Turkey those whom God has given the boon of escaping from the sultan's power. Following are the resolutions:

Resolved, That the horrible massacres of the Armenians in Turkey demand the speedy and effective intervention of the nations of Christendom; and that a special duty rests on our own Government to protect the rights of American citizens which have been endangered or have been violated; and that our people and our Government are under obligations to offer asylum to those who have escaped from massacre with their lives.

AS TO WAYS AND MEANS.

To crystallize enthusiasm into substantial aid to the society was the first undertaking of the business session, which occupied most of Thursday afternoon. Dr. R. R. Meredith and Dr. Nehemiah Boynton were drafted for the important task of appealing for pledges to swell the Jubilee Fund. Each of these gentlemen brought to bear the pressure of his vigorous personality, and Dr. Boynton was particularly felicitous in setting forth this act of giving as a sacred and solemn Christian duty. It was an interesting and memorable scene as Dr. Ryder and Dr. Barton took their places on opposite sides of the platform to keep tally as pledges were handed up to them. The ushers circulated briskly throughout the audience and kept returning to the platform with pledge cards. Fifty dollar shares were taken in rapid succession, and now and then a generous spirit took more than one. In due season the contribution boxes went around to gather up the coin and bills that were immediately available, and the yields from this source together with the pledges amounted ultimately to about $10,000. The spirit of willingness and sacrifice which characterized this season of special giving was its most gratifying feature. It brought great reassurance to the hearts of the officers of the society as they perceived how strongly entrenched is its work in the hearts of its constituents. A fitting culmination to the occasion was the telegram from Florida declaring the Sheats Law to be unconstitutional, and the three minutes of cheering and waving of handkerchiefs which followed made a scene which the new Tremont Temple has probably never before witnessed.

BUSINESS MATTERS.

About 150 gentlemen attended the business meeting at Park Street Church, at which the usual routine went forward without delay or friction. The present efficient president, vice-presidents, secretaries and treasurer were re-elected. The auditors are James H. Oliphant and D. Q. Tiebout. The two new members of the executive committee are Rev. E. S. Tead of Somerville and Frank M. Brooks of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. The finance committee appointed to report at the next annual meeting are Rodney Dennis, Hartford, Ct., C. D. Wood, Brooklyn, N. Y., J. Howard Sweetser, New York, N. Y., W. T. Crowell, Boston, Mass., H. L. Pratt, Brooklyn, N. Y. Intimations of invitations to entertain the association next year were forthcoming from Minneapolis and Oberlin, but it was finally left with the executive committee to determine the place and date.

SHOT AND SHELL.

Hard times are our little Gethsemanes.—Dr. Brand.

Not deportation, but elevation, is the way to get rid of the Negro.—Dr. Hiatt.

Among the addresses on general subjects mention should be made of that of Bishop B. T. Tanner on Universal Brotherhood. A cultivated Negro pleading for his Indian brother as well as for his own despised race was a significant sight.

How the Faneuil Hall crowd did applaud Mr. Capen's remark that "there are no greater enemies of the country today than those who put color against color, class against class"; and Dr. Meredith's denunciation of those who have compromised with silver was equally well received.

The actual number in attendance is only partially indicated by Secretary Hazen's tally of those who reported themselves at headquarters. But over a thousand took pains thus to account for themselves, of whom 244 were life members, 250 delegates from the churches and 531 visitors.

That was a beautiful letter from Bishop Whipple of Minnesota concerning the character of his uncle, George Whipple, the first corresponding secretary of the association, which Secretary Ryder read. How indelible is the impress of a godly man's character upon the soul of an impressionable youth!

The Jubilee Manual, containing the official program and an illustrated historical sketch of Boston and vicinity, deserves unqualified commendation. Fortunate is that committee of arrangements which has for its chairman one as competent to deal with local history and topography as Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D.

The next national convention which meets in Boston could hardly do better than to engage at once the services of the five men who served as a committee of arrangements—Rev. Messrs. Barton, Beale, Tead, Noyes and Mendell. They all belong to the younger circle of pastors in Boston and vicinity, and they know how to make things hum. And the oil of gladness and harmony of service made all the wheels of the intricate machinery move smoothly.

A pleasant event of Wednesday afternoon was the marriage by Dr. Donald in Trinity Church of Dr. S. E. Courtney and Miss Lilla Davis. Dr. Courtney, a graduate of Hampton and Harvard Medical School, was a delegate to the recent Republican convention at St. Louis, the chief representative there of his race in Massachusetts. Miss Davis, a graduate of the Girls' High School in Boston, has been a most valued teacher under the A. M. A. for ten years in Cotton Valley, Ala., the Woman's Home Missionary Association having assumed her support during the time. Secretary A. F. Beard gave the bride away.

"Be they eating here for the association?" asked a motherly woman as she peered into the restaurant temporarily established in one of the lower halls. The polite young woman from whom she sought information seemed a little in doubt as to the precise meaning of her question, and so the good soul explained herself: "Well, I thought that if the food was sent in and the profits went to the association I should try to eat a little more." This desire to have everything inure to the advantage of the association was commendable, even though in this case the dealing out of the rations was a private enterprise. The proprietor, however, was a well-known Congregationalist, and the exceedingly low prices which he maintained would lead to the surmise that his venture was a charitable rather than a mercantile one.

An upper hall in Tremont Temple reminded one vividly of one of our time-honored New England county fairs. Here was held the first industrial exhibit in connection with the annual meeting of the A. M. A., and a creditable and tasteful display it was. The walls of the room were lined with drawings from various A. M. A. schools and interesting photographs of the buildings and students, while on the tables and floor or festooned from the ceiling were the products of the field, the carpenter's shop, the sewing-room and the kitchen. In two separate apartments were to be found printing presses in operation under the care of Negro attendants and a genuine hospital ward, with its neat little cots and bandaged doll patients watched over by trained nurses in spotless white caps and aprons. These two girls from Tougaloo and Talladega attracted much attention and called forth favorable comment from every visitor. It must not be supposed that the Negroes were the only ones to bear witness to the genuine value and excellent quality of the instruction received in the A. M. A. industrial schools. The Indian exhibit was remarkably fine, and indeed no portion of the field was without its fruit.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

Returning home from the Idaho State meeting with a sense of full appreciation of the generosity of a good brother who knew how to use his large means in a most helpful way, our correspondent writes: "Remind your wealthy readers of the opportunities for such memorials, all through this Western country, and that thus the pressure upon the Building Society may be lifted, and many houseless, homeless churches may be filled with joy and made so much more efficient for the Master's work."

What more sincere form of sympathy can be expressed than that of the southern California churches as brought out in their State meeting? Note, also, the ineffective influences of hard times as to debts and new buildings. If such results follow pressing conditions, what may we not expect with coming prosperity?

An Iowa church introduced a novel and helpful feature into its anniversary celebration—a touch of self sacrifice which must have raised it above ordinary occasions of the kind.

The action of that lamented brother in Michigan is more than a practical and touching appreciation of a brother man's interest. It is a valuable testimony to a duty well performed and to the consequent adoption of a strong faith.

In a Missouri community the principal of the academy is also acting pastor of the church. A man sufficiently popular to secure two such positions and able to fill them acceptably ought to succeed in making them mutually helpful.

A local Oklahoma association was evidently alive to the importance of present day issues.

Minneapolis sets a gratifying example in ministerial comity this week.

THE STATE MEETING IN NEBRASKA.

The Congregationalists of this State have made an experiment this year in entertaining delegates. There was some delay in securing a place of meeting, but the pastorless church at Harvard invited the association for Oct. 19–22 and pledged hospitality as far as lodging was concerned. Delegates were then to pay a nominal sum for meals at hotels and restaurants and some private houses. The experiment was a success. The expense to each delegate was small and the relief to families great, so the arrangement is likely to be permanent.

The opening sermon was by Rev. F. A. Warfield. His words struck the keynote of the meeting: The Man with a Message; the Church with a Message. The communion service that followed was of deep interest.

At the time of organization Rev. A. E. Ricker was chosen moderator. An hour was given to a memorial service for four beloved brethren present at the last meeting—Rev. Messrs. W. P. Bennett, G. C. Hall, E. L. Sherman and Pres. J. F. Ellis. Dr. N. H. Whittlesey spoke for the Ministerial Relief Fund. The address of the retiring moderator, Rev. G. W. Mitchell, was a strong plea for a larger place for Christian education.

Rev. J. F. Bacon read a paper on The Man at the Helm, outlining in a vivid way the work of the Congregational pastor as a preacher and as the leader of his church.

The paper of Rev. W. H. Buss was a thoroughly prepared consideration of Civic Duty and Municipal Reform from the standpoint of a Christian patriot. He moved all hearts and his words elicited ringing applause. A full house heard with interest from Dr. M. P. Parmelee of Trebizond about the Armenians and from Rev. T. J. Smith of work in India. The thought of the Wednesday morning prayer meeting, Spiritual Enterprise, ran through all the exercises of the day. A valuable paper by Rev. John Foster emphasized the importance of a better spiritual nurture for our churches.

An afternoon was devoted to the interests of the Nebraska Home Missionary Society and the evening to a stirring home missionary rally. The report of the board of directors was presented by Sec. W. A. Selleck and showed a year of painstaking attention to the State work. The report of Supt. Harmon Bross told the story of progress, notwithstanding the severe limitations of the times. Progress has been shown not so much in the organization of new churches as in the strengthening and enlargement of those already in existence. The churches are becoming more impressed with their responsibility to the rural districts. Mrs. D. B. Perry, president of the W. H. M. U., reported its year of work and made a happy presentation of its claims.

Following these reports addresses were made by Rev. Messrs. C. G. Murphy, W. H. Buss, John Doane, Wilson Denney, and Mrs. E. G. Perkins. At the close of the session the missionary spirit was at full tide and a large committee was appointed to arrange home missionary rallies in different parts of the State. The paper by Superintendent Bross in the evening, Forty Years of Congregationalism in Nebraska, traced the growth by decades from a single church of nine members to the present enrollment of 192 churches and 14,000 members. These raised nearly $150 000 for home expenses last year, and $20,000 for benevolences.

Rev. A. E. Ricker gave the annual address and moved all hearts with his earnest plea for a deeper religious devotion. The reports from the educational institutions Thursday morning presented a year of noble work in the midst of straitened resources and somewhat lessened attendance. Then Rev. A. J. Rogers spoke upon The Man in the Minister. The afternoon session was devoted to Sunday school work with the report of State committee and of Superintendent Stewart. The evening session was devoted to the interests of the C. C. B. S. and the A. M. A., presented by Rev. W. S. Hampton and Rev. James Cross.

Among the resolutions passed was one urging prompt action on the part of our government in the Armenian affair. Altogether the session has been one of the best in the history of the association. H. B.

THE IDAHO ASSOCIATION.

The third meeting of this body met in Boise, Oct. 8, 9. On the evening of Oct. 7 occurred the dedication of the memorial chapel in Boise, and O. H. Ingram, Esq., of Eau Claire, Wis, whose generous gift to the C. C. B. S. made the erection of the chapel possible, was present and took deep interest in the exercises. The building is the memorial of a daughter of Mr. Ingram, and her husband, Mr. Shellman, was also present and gave the church a fine portrait of his wife, which was hung upon the walls of the new house. Rev. C. H. Taintor gave a touching address at these exercises and preached the dedication sermon.

The church had been unable to carpet the floor, but Mr. Ingram again came to the rescue, and, by working men all night, it was possible to finish the task before the dedication. Rev. W. S. Hawkes offered the dedicatory prayer, and other brethren of the association assisted. Thus, in the capital city of the State, this church, that has been struggling for five years in a hired hall, was installed in its own house, and it takes up its work with new courage.

The chapel will seat about 300 and is full of beauty in the Swiss style of architecture. The foundation is of gray sandstone, Above this to the window sills is white, rubble masonry with cut stone corners. The rest of the exterior is covered with shingles.

Rev. W. S. Hawkes was moderator of the association, and Rev. C. E. Mason scribe. The reports from the field were encouraging. Rev. A. G. Upton, president of Weiser College and Academy, spoke upon The Church and Education, and reported for the school. The institution is filling a pressing need, and is greatly strengthened as it enters its new buildings. Rev. C. E. Mason spoke upon the Social Problems of the Church, and Rev. C. H. Taintor and H. E. McElroy, Esq., discussed What the Church Expects of Her Members and What the Church Expects of Her Pastor. Rousing addresses by Superintendents Clapp of Oregon and Hawkes of Utah lifted the people to a high pitch of enthusiasm for the Master's work.

An afternoon was given to the work of the Woman's Missionary Union, with addresses and papers from Mrs. W. S. Hawkes, Mrs. R. B. Wright, Mrs. C. E. Mason and others. The women here are not behind their sisters in older States in plans to aid the extension of Christ's kingdom. But a great gloom rested upon this meeting because of the sudden call to higher service of Mrs. E. A. Paddock. The loss of her helpfulness and wisdom is almost irreparable in the State, with so many interests of church and school and the wider interests of our denominational life resting upon her.

The session closed with a magnificent address by Secretary Taintor, The Men of the Mayflower. The association voted to meet next year in Challis, 75 miles remote from the railway in summer and 150 miles from the nearest railway station in the winter. All felt that we had had an uplifting meeting, and the sentiment was in all hearts, "Idaho for Christ." R. B. W.

THE WYOMING STATE MEETING.

The fifth annual meeting of this association was held in the Union Church, Wheatland, Oct. 13–15. The pastor, Rev. J. M. Brown, gave a short address of welcome. Rev. E. E. Smiley preached the annual sermon from the text, This Do, and the theme was Congregationalism Practical. The roll-call of churches found the attendance larger than at any previous meeting. Deacon A. Underwood was chosen moderator and Rev. J. M. Brown scribe. The reports of the churches were inspiring, showing growth, work and consecration. Never before were our churches manned so fully. Hope is prevalent in all our State work.

The Woman's Missionary Union occupied part of a session with its annual meeting. The subjects were: Why, When, How, and Sowing Beside All Waters.

The topics of the general meetings were such as to increase the desire of the delegates for right living without as well as within the church. They embraced: The Need of a University Education, by Prof. F. P. Graves; The C. C. B. S., by Rev. C. H. Taintor; The Future of Our State as Influenced by Our Sunday Schools, Rev. C. N. Fitch; One Thing I Do, Rev. A. D. Shockley; Christian Citizenship, Rev. O. L. Corbin; The Y. P. S. C. E., Fifteen Years After; The Best Work Which a Man Can Do, Rev. E. E. Smiley. Superintendent Brown gave a descriptive account of the annual meeting of the C. H. M. S. in New Haven, Ct., which delighted his hearers.

The "tenth banner" was presented to the Manville church, all but one of whose members had given a tenth of their income to God during the year. Cheyenne was chosen as the next meeting place. J. M. B.

The meeting of Cleveland Conference at Berea was one of the best and most largely attended ever held. The addresses were marked by thoughtfulness and care in preparation. Almost every church in city and country was represented and the commodious edifice was nearly filled at all sessions. Dr. Farnsworth was warmly welcomed as representative of the American Board, and Secretary Wiard for the Home Missionary Society. Rev. A. B. Cristy, the retiring moderator, preached an eloquent sermon, The Obligation of the Church Member—to his own church, to other churches of the denomination, to the missionary societies. The Sunday School—its relation to the churches, its devotional spirit, its evangelizing power, its teachers; Preparation for Revival, After the Revival, What? were among the topics. Strong resolutions were adopted on the Armenian question and indorsing the Ohio Anti-Saloon League.

S. to withhold a commission from a pastor who fails to take collections for home missions and church building.

CLUBS.

MASS.—Rev. J. A. McColl addressed the North Bristol Club at Taunton, at its October meeting, on The Patriot Christ and the Christian Patriot.

The present administration of the Boston Club has given the membership nothing better than the address last Monday evening of Prof. B. C. Blodgett of Smith College on Church Music. The only disappointed hearers were those who looked for an abstract, technical paper. Instead, he spoke without any notes, in a simple, informal style, but in the choicest English. It was a straightforward plea for giving music its rightful place in the service of the church, for making it both impressive and expressive. He urged a high standard of hymns and tunes, and averred that the men of his profession were disposed to work sympathetically with pastors and music committees toward securing a more effective and beautiful service of praise.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Shawmut.—Last Sunday, in place of the regular services, missionary addresses were given by A. M. A. representatives who were in the city to attend the jubilee meeting. The Fisk University singers rendered selections.——Union. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, the former pastor, occupied his old pulpit last Sunday, much to the delight of the congregation.

The many friends of Barna S. Snow, secretary of the Boston Seaman's Friend Society, will be glad to hear that he is restored in a good measure to his former health. He is at present still availing himself of the recuperative influences of Cape Cod, but hopes to be able to resume his office work not later than Jan. 1.

Massachusetts.

CHELSEA.—Central. Last Sunday was the 25th anniversary of the dedication of the house of worship and the day was fittingly celebrated by special exercises. The pastor, Rev. C. E. Jefferson, gave a historical address, following which the treasurer, in sight of a great congregation, burned the mortgage which represented the last $5,500 of the first mortgage of $43,000. The church is now free from debt with $800 in the treasury. A letter from Rev. C. P. H. Nason, a former pastor, bore his congratulations to the church.

CAMBRIDGE.—Shepard Memorial. The union meeting in the interests of the A. M. A. last Sunday evening was unusually large. The Fisk jubilee singers gave selections, and addresses by missionary speakers were part of the program.

NEWTON.—Eliot. The 250th anniversary of the beginning of John Eliot's work among the Indians was fittingly observed last Sunday at this church named for him. The edifice stands but a short distance from the spot where he begun his missionary labors and has a stained glass window representing him preaching to the red men. The city also observed the occasion. The real date was Oct. 28, but the church chose to celebrate on Sunday. At the morning service an elaborate historical address was given by Rev. E. H. Byington, D. D., a member of the church, other parts in the service being taken by Rev. H. J. Patrick, D. D., and Rev. J. W. Wellman, D. D., a former pastor. In the evening four addresses were given on The Roxbury Pastorate by Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke of the Unitarian church; The Indian Question Two Hundred and Fifty Years Ago by Rev. G. E. Merrill, D. Pierce, a member of this church and a teacher in the Girl's School at Aintab, Turkey, is at home after an absence of 22 years and spoke at a recent union meeting telling of her work and experiences during the massacre of the Armenians.——Tabernacle. Miss Eunice Kitto, an Indian girl and graduate of the Santee Normal Training School, lately addressed the Tabernacle Y. P. S. C. E., whose members for several years contributed for her education. She was given a hearty greeting.

NORTH ANDOVER.—Evangelist Jackson, with a singer, Mr. O. M. Crowell, held three weeks of special services recently. Evident refreshings attended the effort and a large number of persons gave evidence of a new life. More than 100 from 15 to 50 years of age signed cards. Dr. H. E. Barnes is pastor.

NEWBURYPORT.—Belleville. With the mural tablet, recently dedicated in honor of the first pastor of the church, Rev. James Miltimore, the giver, the late Miss A. E. Rousseau, also contributed $800 for any use to which the church might apply it. Doubtless some changes in the audience-room will soon be made. The Boys' Brigade has begun its fall meetings with unabated zeal and earnestness. The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip lecture course for the winter has met with its usual success in the advance sale of tickets, and provides five entertainments at nominal cost, seventy-five cents, with the purpose of merely covering the cost. At a recent sale held by the Missionary Society $65 were realized for the purchase of a missionary library to be circulated in the parish. The last monthly afternoon tea and literary meeting of the society was attended by 50 women.

LOWELL.—Kirk Street. A church league has been formed whose chief object is to interest all the men in the evening service and to reach those who have no church home. This church is joined by the entire city in sorrow for the death of Deacon Philetus Burnham, who was beloved by all. He has been an attendant since the formation of the church, was the teacher of the largest class in the Sunday school and had served as deacon for the past 25 years.

FALL RIVER.—Central. The claims of the A. B. C. F. M. were presented by Dr. J. L. Barton last Sunday. The collection taken amounted to over $700, the largest taken for the Board in this church for many years.

WORCESTER.—Old South. Dr. A. Z. Conrad, the pastor, preached his sixth anniversary sermon Oct. 18. His pastorate has been remarkably prosperous. Over 600 members have united with the church, making the present membership nearly 900. The church is thoroughly organized and continually alive in service. A Men's Union of 150 members has just been organized. There are three strong Endeavor Societies, a Sunday school of 600 members, a brotherhood of young men whose distinctive purpose is work for the salvation of young men, a Young Ladies' Union of 100 members and a Ladies' Benevolent Society, which, in addition to general benevolent work, is concerned in the social life of the church.——Piedmont. A Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip has been organized with 15 members.——Central. Belmont and Greendale People's Church united with this church last Sunday evening and were addressed by Rev. W. G. Puddefoot.

SHREWSBURY.—The vestry has been newly frescoed and further improvement made. The church is in good condition.

DALTON.—The Y. P. S. C. E. has appropriated $10 for trees to be set on the parsonage grounds. A collection taken by this church for the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society amounted to about $70.

PALMER.—Second. The services under the care of the Men's Sunday Evening Club have opened promisingly this fall, the attendance being excellent and the club assuming its duties with vigor.

CHICOPEE.—Third. Rev. Charles Pease was ordained pastor, Oct 20. His examination was entirely satisfactory. After the banquet provided by the women of the church the evening exercises were held, the sermon being preached by Dr. B. W. Lockhart. The new pastor is a native of Connecticut and graduate of Hartford Seminary. He has supplied this church about two years.

WEST STOCKBRIDGE.—Oct. 19 was observed as "old folks' day." The pastor, Rev. W. W. Curtis, preached on Bringing Forth Fruit in Old Age at the morning service, and in the evening a concert exercise was held, with one of The Congregationalist's Services and readings on the subject of Old Age. The church was decorated with autumn leaves.

Maine.

PORTLAND.—St. Lawrence Street. The corner stone of the new edifice was laid with appropriate services Oct. 19, and the large concourse of persons witnessed to the widespread interest in the event. The $25,000 necessary in order to secure all subscriptions have been raised. The structure will be a splendid monument to the fidelity and spiritual quality of Rev. A. H. Wright's 26 years' pastorate. The prayer at the laying of the corner stone was by Rev. D. M. Pratt, and addresses were made by Drs. W. H. Fenn, J. L. Jenkins and the pastor. An original poem was read by Miss M. C. Merrill. Four of the city churches gave illustrations of fraternal Christian spirit Oct. 4 and 11 in helping, by a special offering, to complete the subscription, by a gift of $400, the Williston leading by a collec- of $170. The building will be completed this winter, and dedicated free of debt next June. About $5,000 more will be needed for furnishings and equipments.

KENNEBUNK.—A hopeful report comes from this church. An increase of $100 is noted in the benevolences, which amount to $650. The 25th wedding anniversary of the pastor, Rev. G. A. Lockwood, and his wife was observed by a social gathering and gift of a roll of bills from this people, whom he has served for 17 years.

BANGOR.—Evangelist D. L. Moody has been holding a series of meetings under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Last week Saturday evening and Sunday Central Church was filled, and after that the City Hall was filled with a congregation of 2,000 or more with great interest. A choir of 300 did excellent service.

GREEN'S LANDING.—This church parts with its faithful pastor, Rev. S. A. Apraham, with regret. He feels that he must take the platform in behalf of his persecuted countrymen, the Armenians.

AUBURN.—Sixth Street protests earnestly against the resignation of Rev. L. J. Thomas, and at a recent meeting offered, among other inducements, a protracted period for rest.

SOUTH PARIS.—Rev. R. J. Haughton, the pastor, observes the fourth anniversary of his settlement by an earnest pastoral letter to his people.

New Hampshire.

BARTLETT.—A modest but symmetrical and becoming church edifice is in process of erection at an estimated cost of $5,000. It is to have a vestry directly back of the audience-room and separated by folding doors, with a total seating capacity, when used together, of 300. The organ and choir section are at one side of the pulpit and a small ante-room for the pastor at the other. Over the vestry is a ladies' parlor, and in the basement a commodious and convenient kitchen and dining-room, the latter to be used for evening classes. In the basement also a cheerful and attractive reading-room is planned for and some unfinished space will be utilized hereafter as there may be need. The outlook is full of promise.

HANOVER.—Rev. J. H. Twichell, D. D., of Hartford, Ct., and President Hyde of Bowdoin College have recently occupied the college pulpit. A collection of $135 has just been taken for the A. M. A. Dartmouth College has received a bequest of $3,000 from the estate of Miss S. B. Foster, a native of Hanover, to found the "Richard Foster Scholarship," in memory of her father, to aid worthy poor young men studying for the evangelical ministry.

HAVERHILL.—A granite curbing set on the approaches to the meeting house and chapel and the laying of concrete walks has greatly improved the church conveniences. A portion of the necessary funds for this was raised by a sociable recently given by the "Willing Workers."

STODDARD.—The parsonage has been undergoing needed repairs now approaching completion, and work has already begun on the interior of the meeting house. A new bell costing about $90 has been put in place beside the old one.

NELSON.—This home missionary church, with only 45 resident members, has given the present year $54 to four different objects as decided by vote at the last annual meeting, home missions leading with a contribution of $21.

WASHINGTON.—Through the generosity of Hon. Dexter Richards of Newport the church has been furnished with a handsome new communion service.

Preparations are being perfected in Tilton for a series of evangelistic services during the month of November.——Revival services in Peterboro are also being arranged for.

Vermont.

JAMAICA.—Union meetings, under the leadership of Rev. A. J. Cameron, the pastor, have resulted in about 20 conversions.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Academy Avenue. This church has had a prosperous season during the present year. Fifty members have been added since January, and the salary has been increased, with prospect soon of further advance——Pilgrim. The 200 families of the church are to have the Congregational Work for the first year. The Endeavor Society arranged a reception Oct. 21 to the students of Brown University, which was well attended. An experienced kindergarten teacher has charge of the primary Sunday school.

Elmwood Temple. Rev. E. T. Root was installed pastor Oct. 22. He presented a strong statement of Christian belief, somewhat out of the ordinary form in respect of the emphasis given to the sociological aspect of faith in Christ. For five years he has been in the ministry, for a time in New York city as assistant in the University Place Presbyterian Church and then as pastor of a Baltimore church. Dr. J. E. Twitchell preached the sermon.

Connecticut.

HARTFORD.—South. An innovation in the way of a social gathering to take the place of the weekly prayer meeting at a stated time was instituted with great success last week. Brief speeches were made, urging the young people to take an active interest in church work, and the remainder of the evening was spent in social intercourse.——Windsor Avenue. Mrs. L. A. Chapin, who died recently at the advanced age of 79, was one of the original members of the church and was a much valued and esteemed member.——The reports presented at the 22d annual meeting of the Hartford Branch of the W. B. M. showed a successful year, the receipts amounting to $7,047, the largest amount received in any year by regular contributions. The branch consists of 52 auxiliaries, 11 junior bodies, 16 mission circles and 11 cradle rolls. The aggregate membership of the auxiliaries is 1,771, a gain of 100 for the year.

SIMSBURY.—In making the changes on the church a pewter platter 156 years old was found that was first used at the raising of the first house for worship in 1740, and was subsequently used again at the raising of the new meeting house in 1830. It did service as a collection plate on a recent Sunday morning. The repairs and alterations are now practically completed, although at the time of the dedication the carpets were not laid nor the painting finished.

NEW HAVEN.—At the Ministers' Meeting, Oct. 26, Direct Legislation was discussed by Prof. E. V. Raynolds of Yale.——United. The recent Sunday morning collection for the C. H. M. S. amounted to $450.——Redeemer. The pastor, Dr. W. L. Phillips, preached on a recent Sunday evening on Responsibilities of Young Americans.——Howard Avenue. On a recent Sunday evening the pastor, Rev. W. J. Mutch, preached on The Responsibility of Citizenship.

THOMASTON.—First, Rev. R. W. Sharp, pastor, has suffered removals, owing to slack work in the factories. Attendance upon services, however, was never better. The prayer meetings, especially, are full. The entire number of additions during the present pastorate is nearly 100—a little less than one-third of the entire membership.

POMFRET.—Mrs. Mary R. Hunt, widow of Rev. Daniel Hunt, who was pastor of the church here for many years, and who died here about 25 years ago, passed away at her home in Columbia last week, at the age of 89 years.

HUNTINGTON.—The subscriptions to the new organ, which was put in a year ago at a cost of $600, have now all been paid in, and the debt on it is canceled.

NEW MILFORD.—This church holds to the custom of renting pews, and the sale this year was $400 greater than that of a year ago.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

NEW YORK.—Manhattan. An important business meeting was held Oct. 23, and fully attended. Six deacons were elected, three members of the council, a clerk, treasurer and superintendent of the Sunday school. The church is fortunate in securing the services of Dr. W. L. Hervey for the last named office. He is president of the Teachers' College and widely known as an educator. After the church meeting the legally called meeting of the church and congregation took final action as to their incorporation. Nine trustees were elected. The church and corporation formally confirmed the call to Dr. H. A. Stimson previously issued by the provisional committee. Dr. Stimson responded briefly and affectionately. A council will be called Nov. 9 for recognition of the church and the installation of the pastor. The devoted labors and remarkable success of the provisional committee were recognized by vote.

ITHACA.—Last week Sunday evening Dr. W. E. Griffis began a course of sermons, the object of which is to show the real foundations of Christianity and the fruitless nature of negative opinions and criticism. The church has organized a chorus of 30 voices under Mr. H. E. Dann.

NORTH PITCHER.—A new church building has just been completed to replace that destroyed by fire last winter. The dedication took place Oct. 22, the sermon being preached by Dr. Edward Taylor.

CANDOR.—The church building is undergoing repairs, the roof being reshingled and the walls of the auditorium newly frescoed.

New Jersey.

JERSEY CITY.—Tabernacle. The People's Palace, which is associated with this church, has given this season 12,273 free baths to the poor, who are very grateful. A new feature this summer has been a large combination playroom and roof garden connected with the day nursery. It was an addition greatly needed, but owing to lack of money it had to be put in a low room, where the heat in the hot spell was intense. Children of laboring women are cared for, fed and entertained for 10 cents a day, two children for 15 cents. Every evening and afternoon the work of ministration to the socially nonelect goes on in some practical line.

ASBURY PARK.—A church was organized June 12, with a membership of 144. At the first communion 11 more were received. The congregations have been large, notwithstanding the services were held in a hall. The new church is made up chiefly of believers who were formerly connected with the local Presbyterian church, but who, finding they could not continue to work and worship harmoniously under the old auspices, concluded that a new organization was called for. A council, composed of a number of New Jersey churches and a few from New York, convened and recognized it Oct. 20.

WOODBRIDGE.—The recent annual meeting disclosed the fact that the church is in good shape financially. A system of cottage prayer meetings has been started. Ground has been broken for a new Sunday school room, which is to be 60 feet by 40, fitted up in modern style.

THE SOUTH.

District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON.—First has again resumed its winter activities and celebrated last week the 25th anniversary of the ordination of the pastor, Dr. S. M. Newman. This week he returns to his first charge in Taunton, Mass., to assist in the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the Congregational church in that place.——Fifth. The annual roll-call was held on Oct. 18, nearly every member being present and responding by rising and reading or repeating a selection of Scripture. A harvest home service was held in the evening, the decorations, addresses and music carrying out the thought and lessons of the season in an unusually interesting manner.

Arkansas.

Rev. Robert L. Layfield, evangelist, of Kansas City, Oct. 18 began a series of special meetings with the church at Rogers, Rev. R. C. Walton, pastor.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

CLEVELAND.—Franklin Avenue. Spiritual interest has been steadily increasing of late. The prayer meetings and Sunday services are unusually well attended. An interesting new feature is the teachers' Bible class, which meets after the Friday evening meeting. The new pastor is Rev. B. G. Newton.——Grace. Multiplied opportunities prove to be fine promoters of fellowship. At the council which dismissed Rev. J. H. Hull from the pastorate, Oct. 20, nearly every church in the city was represented. The women served a bountiful supper, a delightful social hour was spent by the church and council, and this closing event of a 10 years' pastorate will be cherished by church and pastor with pleasant memories. Mr. Hull came to the church when it had but 30 members and was heavily in debt. Though it is not now strong, it has received more than 250 members, mostly on confession, has paid its debt and has been for three or four years past independent of home missionary aid. The recent death of Mr. Hull's father makes necessary his removal temporarily to Sandusky, and he has accepted an urgent invitation to supply for a year the struggling church at Lakeside, across the bay from there. Grace Church at first unanimously refused to accept his resignation, but after an urgent fraternal letter from the Lakeside church the resignation was accepted.——Lakewood has been compelled by the financial stringency still further to delay beginning on its greatly needed house of worship, for which plans had been prepared and bids received. The present small chapel has been repaired and made comfortable for the coming winter, with the hope of a new building in the spring.——Pilgrim. The Women's Association gave a reception to Mrs. Pitkin, and the Endeavor Societies gave a tea in honor of her and her husband, more than 100 members being seated at the tables. Mr. Pitkin recently addressed the Sunday school and spoke at both Sunday morning and evening services.

Michigan.

ALPENA.—The church has extended a call to Rev. James McAllister of Minneapolis, where he has labored for three years with good success. The late W. H. Potter of this church, an honored business man of the city, who died last September, was a man of considerable wealth and great generosity. He has left some handsome gifts to worthy men of his employ and notably remembered Rev. A. B. Allen, Oberlin, O., who, as his pastor, had the honor of leading Mr. Potter to make the great and important decision of his life.

LANSING.—Plymouth. At a regular meeting of the church, Oct. 22, the resolutions adopted by the American Board at Toledo concerning the duty of the United States Government to her citizens in Turkey were heartily indorsed, and a committee was appointed to prepare a statement to be sent to Pres. J. B. Angell, chairman of the committee of the American Board.

DETROIT.—Fort Street. A political social was held Oct. 15 and was a success.——Polish Mission. Rev. John Lewis is working with hope and courage in this hard field. The mission needs new quarters, more central, for its work.

RICHMOND.—This church rejoices in the speedy and happy settlement of Rev. S. A. Long, who takes up the work so well developed and maintained by the late pastor, Rev. H. R. Williams.

OXFORD.—Rev. J. S. Edmunds leaves this church after a short but pleasant pastorate. He leaves a warmly attached people. He has a call to the church at Chelsea.

DEXTER.—Rev. Frank Blomfield was tendered a reception by the church, which he is just leaving. Gifts were presented at that time.

FLINT.—A thank offering meeting was held recently and $16 were contributed to foreign missions.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

CARTHAGE.—Great anxiety has been felt for the church in this beautiful and important city of southwestern Missouri during some months of depression which seemed to threaten its very existence. A much more hopeful spirit now prevails. Nineteen persons have recently been received to membership. Attendance on all services, particularly those held in the evening, has largely increased. Under the leadership of the pastor, Rev. A. J. Van Wagner, the church is enjoying a period of courage and activity in expectation of greater revival.

GRANDIN.—A reading-room has been opened in the meeting house. The liberality of the Grandin Lumber Company, shown in contributing a site for the church, besides a parsonage and material for the church building, together valued at $1,500, has not prevented the offerings of the people for the edifice and the support of the pastor. During this, the first, year of the church's history these amount to $3,035. The impression that the lumber company pays all the bills is incorrect.

IBERIA.—Principal G. Byron Smith of the academy is acting pastor of the church. The academy has larger attendance and more teachers than heretofore, and the townspeople have shown more interest in its support. Twenty young persons trained here are teaching in the country schools. Several in Drury College and elsewhere are preparing for the ministry.

NOBLE.—Seven members of this church, which is 40 miles from a railroad, recently drove 85 miles over the rough roads of the Ozark Mountains to attend the association meeting at Springfield. The academy, which at great self-sacrifice has been sustained here for several years, is now for the first time closed. It is hoped soon to reopen it.

KANSAS CITY.—Olivet. The corner stone of the new edifice, which is to be of stone, was laid, Oct. 11, with addresses by Dr. Henry Hopkins, Rev. J. G. Dougherty and Evangelist Robert Layfield.

JOPLIN.—This church, of which Rev. J. C. Plumb was pastor, owing to the sale of its property and the scattering of its members, has discontinued services for the present.

NEW CAMBRIA.—Welsh. A house of worship, replacing the one destroyed by fire some months ago, was dedicated by special services, Oct. 17-19.

Work has been begun upon the new building for the Bohemian church, St. Louis. Rev. A. L. Love will superintend its construction.

Iowa.

GLENWOOD.—The church celebrated its 40th anniversary Oct. 18 by giving the largest collection for home missions in its history. Last year's amount will be nearly doubled. The Sunday school observed the day as "rally" Sunday. The house was beautifully decorated. The evening service was given to reminiscences of the early days of the church and to thanksgiving for the devoted service of Father John Todd and other foundation builders. Rev. M. D. Reed is pastor.

Evangelist F. B. Smith, now in Y. M. C. A. service, has been engaged for meetings during the coming season by the following Iowa churches: Newell, Garner, Thompsen and Buffalo Center and First Church, Dubuque. The State H. M. S. will be unable to employ an evangelist this winter on account of hard times.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Plymouth. During the annual convention of the State C. E. Society, Oct. 23-25, a denominational rally was held at this church with addresses from Dr. D. N. Beach on What Congregationalism Stands For; and from Rev. J. A. Stemen on Applying the Cardinal Principles of Congregationalism to C. E. Work. Representatives of the various missionary societies and of Carleton College gave two-minute addresses. The hour gave the young people new insight and interest in the great work of the churches.—Fremont Ave. Rev. James McAllister, who leaves this pastorate to accept a call to the largest church in Alpena, Mich., has done excellent service, not only in distinctively religious work, but to the cause of better municipal government as well.—The ministers of this city have invited those in St. Paul to meet with them the first Monday in November.

North Dakota.

FARGO.—Scandinavian. This church is making excellent progress under the efficient lead of Rev. L. J. Pederson. It is the center of work for this nationality in North Dakota and northern Minnesota, where the Scandinavian population is estimated at 70 per cent. of the whole. The H. M. Society has aided the enterprise for the past three years, but finds it no longer has funds for the purpose. To abandon it at this time is most disastrous.

DWIGHT.—Rev. D. T. Jenkins closed his pastorate here Oct. 11. His parishioners and friends gave him a delightful farewell reception at the parsonage Oct. 12, and presented his wife with a beautiful dinner set and silver beaker as a token of high regard. The mission band, under the lead of the pastor's wife, is to present the church with a bell. Mr. Jenkins will begin work at once at Hillsboro and Kelso.

Mr. Sarles comes from Yale Divinity School.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

The canvass on Cape Cod from house to house during the summer was under the direction of H. M. Moore, Esq., as chairman of the committee. Rev. S. P. Cook, superintendent, and Lay College students from Revere were the workers. Nearly 250 Bibles and parts thereof were sold, 81 were given and 23 destitute families were supplied. More than 750 books of the Moody Colportage Library and similar works were sold or given and tracts were distributed. Ninety services were held, 1,323 different families were visited, work was done on cranberry bogs among the pickers, 2,000 visits in all made in homes and meetings were held in 15 churches and chapels.

RESPECT THE STOMACH.—Few people do have proper respect for the stomach. If a thing "tastes good" and is not so hot or so cold as to be painful to the mouth or throat it is swallowed by too many people regardless of consequences. Do not give the stomach food that will irritate it or retard it in the performance of its natural functions, or it will retaliate in a way that is decidedly unpleasant. A headache, a "lump" or "heavy feeling" in the stomach and irritations of the skin are mostly symptoms of disordered digestion, resulting from unwholesome food. Alum baking powders are responsible for the larger part of this unwholesome food, for it is a fact well recognized by physicians that alum renders food indigestible and unwholesome. The danger to health from this cause is so imminent that it behooves every one to adopt precautionary measures to keep alum baking powders, which are now so numerous, from the kitchen stores. It will be found that those powders sold at a lower price than Royal are almost invariably made from alum, and therefore of inferior quality and dangerous to health. The safer way is to look for the well-known red and yellow label of the Royal Baking Powder. That is certain to cover a powder free from alum. The Royal is made of cream of tartar, a pure, wholesome fruit acid derived from grapes. It is renowned for adding anti-dyspeptic qualities to the food, as well as for making finer and better food.

The 10th anniversary of the dedication of Dwight Hall, the handsome home of the Yale University Y. M. C. A., was observed Oct. 18. The total membership in 1886 was 256. It is now 1,008. There are 333 associate members against 21 in 1886. Ten years ago the annual expenses were $225. For 1896 they were $4,700.

Scrofula Is

Impurity in the blood, which, accumulating in the glands of the neck, produces unsightly lumps or swellings; causes painful running sores on the limbs or feet; develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, and other manifestations usually ascribed to "humors," which, fastening upon the lungs, cause consumption and death.

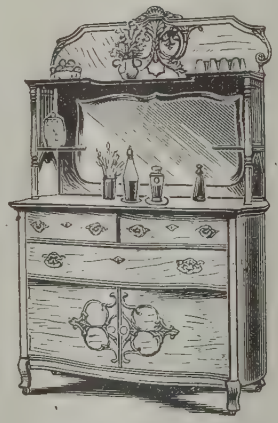
CATCHY DESIGNS.



If you want to see how trade is started and a veritable furore created among purchasers, look at the sideboards of this year 1896.

Ordinarily we sell about the same quantity of sideboards each year. This year we are selling almost double the quantity. What is the reason for it? It is simply that the sideboards of this season are so fascinating that they tempt scores of persons who would not ordinarily have bought one.

The swells and bombe sections of the base are a novelty, and they greatly highten the beauty of the design. The top shelf is treated as two corner shelves, with a narrow connecting shelf and an extra high carved gallery behind.

There are hanging shelves at the hight of about one third of the mirror. The general arrangement of the drawers, closets, etc., is so complete that it leaves nothing to be desired.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

The volume of general trade scarcely gets out of the rut of conservatism into which it has fallen. Fortunately it is not into the "slough of despond" that business has fallen, for hope of the future has not been so bright for a long time as it is at present, and is entirely due to the feeling or conviction that sound money will be overwhelmingly triumphant at the polls next Tuesday. Every day brings greater assurance of McKinley's election, and men are building great expectations of an enormous revival of trade upon that fact.

In the stock market there is less conservatism than in business circles, as witness the strength of securities and the nervous disposition to discount the sound money victory.

Copper stocks should bear watching, as most of them have as yet practically experienced no advance, Boston being less of speculative center than New York. But these copper stocks are going to have as great an advance, if McKinley is elected, as any other group, and if Bryan is elected they will come off better than almost any of the others, for the reason that they will continue to sell a great portion of their product abroad for gold and pay their labor in silver. In other words, free silver eventually means larger profits for them.

In this article last week the writer predicted the break in wheat which came. The rise had been sharp and steady and the break in price was the perfectly natural result of some heavy realizing and the advance in money rates at Chicago. Indications point to a further advance in wheat, on the predication that importing countries have small stocks, that there has been a considerable decrease in the world's production during the past two years, that there have been short crops this year in other producing countries and only an average wheat crop in the United States in 1896.

Collections are poor in most sections of the country. At the close of the week money rates were a trifle easier, and financial institutions are accommodating their customers at lower rates than ten days or two weeks ago, but outside business they do not care to take unless at fancy rates and frequently not then. Mercantile paper is, however, in a little better demand, which is a hopeful sign. Total bank clearings in the United States last week were $1,047,000,000, which was about 5 per cent. more than the previous week and 10 per cent. less than for the corresponding week of last year.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. THOMAS STOUGHTON POTWIN.

The sad death of Mr. Potwin occurred at Hartford, Ct., Oct. 22, after several months' suffering from mental illness. He was born at East Windsor, Ct., April 4, 1829. Graduating from Yale in 1851, he acted as tutor in Latin and Greek in that college from 1854 to 1857; then, after spending a year at Hartford Seminary, he was ordained pastor at Franklin, N. Y., this having been his only pastorate. For a number of years he was superintendent of the Orphan Asylum in Hartford, but since 1887 has lived in retirement.

TWO SIDES OF THE SHIELD.

Many of the most prominent Congregational ministers of the East and Interior have preached on the currency question during the last few months and their words have been extensively quoted. We have received a copy of a sermon recently preached by Dr. J. H. Ecob of the First Congregational Church of Denver on the moral issues involved in the campaign, which is a fervid plea for the coinage of silver at the rate of sixteen to one. We select from it the following paragraphs, a part only of his answer to Eastern ministers.

THE SILVER SIDE.

After characterizing England as "the great devil fish" and "the Shylock of the nations," and explaining that Lombard Street and Wall Street are crying for gold that they may become the dictators of the world, Dr. Ecob said:

Now, I am ready to answer my brethren in the pulpits of the East. You are crying: "Your fifty-cent dollar is a lie and a fraud," and you are waving the Ten Commandments and shouting up and down the land, "Stop, thief! Stop, thief!" I reply, your dollar-and-a-half dollar is the most gigantic criminal the world has ever seen. It is the Judas of righteous prosperity. Any system that can slide our dollars up is just as wicked as any system that can slide them down.

Your dollar-and-a half dollar is as wicked as a forty-inch yardstick or a ten quart peck measure. Your claim, my beloved brethren, reminds me of the legend of New Netherlands. Those shrewd old Dutch fathers of ours persuaded the innocent Indians that a white man's hands weighed just a pound apiece. But when the Indian came with his products the white man always bought with his right hand and sold with his left hand. He bought with a two pound, or three-pound, or just-as-many-a-pound hand as the innocence of his victim would warrant. He sold with a left hand laid gingerly, delicately in the balance. A natural result: One day the Indian saw a light and scalped that Dutchman. Looking across two centuries I say, "Well done, my good red brother."

So when your Eastern capital comes with its dollar-and-a half or two-dollar dollar and demands of our farmers two or three bushels of wheat for it, you need not be surprised if those same farmers draw their ballots and reach for the scalp of that system. It is a wicked system, as all history attests. It stands today surrounded by its appropriate results. The business of the Christian world is paralyzed, public works, manufactories, schools, churches, homes depleted, exhausted, and the cry of the poor filling the land.

But no fifty-cent dollar can perpetrate greater crimes than your two-dollar dollar is this day committing before our very eyes. They are both wicked dollars. But by actual count your big dollar is just four times a bigger rascal than the other. And when the case comes before conscience we must say it is a hundred-fold the greater villain, for your two-dollar dollar is the friend of the rich and the strong. The fifty cent dollar would commit its sins in behalf of the toiling, suffering debtor class.

Professor Park used to say there are lovely sinners and ugly saints. Your big dollar is an ugly saint. The little dollar is a lovely sinner. If we must have a false dollar of some kind, either too big or too little, every minister of Jesus Christ is bound to pray for, preach for and vote for the dollar that befriends the unfortunate.

THE GOLD SIDE.

The other side of the shield is shown by a recent sermon of Dr. R. S. Storrs of Brooklyn, in which he characterized the free silver movement as an attempt to establish a debased and dishonest currency in this country—a currency that will not be accepted in the markets of the world, that strikes half off the value of everything within our borders, that seeks to make this nation repudiate its own obligations, not only among those who have loaned it money, but, what is even more appalling, among those who carried its flag through the many dangers of the Civil War.

Of this attempt Dr. Storrs said:

There is with us today, as was once at Mount Sinai, a silent power that is going forth in the world. That power is the voice of God, which will not remain silent when endeavors are being made to establish dishonesty and dishonor. Think of the dangerous consequences that would follow such a thing!

In the end there would be paralysis in business and commerce, and of the most appalling character. There would come catastrophe here and there, and bankruptcy and disaster everywhere throughout our country. We would have a condition of affairs more productive of ills than any we have ever known. There would be visions of apprehension, of terror and of general disorder of which there is no example in the history of mankind. But let us be patient, even though such evil powers have the forces that seem likely to carry them into power.

STILL ANOTHER VIEW.

Dr. Lyman Abbott expresses his view in an article which may properly follow the reading of the trenchant sayings on both sides printed above. He says:

The doubtful voter should consider that in this honest difference of opinion the best that can be said for free silver coinage is that it is an experiment, not to say an extra hazardous experiment, and if Mr. Bryan's convictions should prove ill founded, and the convictions of his equally honest and not less well-informed opponents should prove well founded, the experiment is one which would bring disaster to this country and irremediable suffering and irretrievable financial ruin upon unnumbered homes. A man may hazard his own fortunes in a doubtful experiment. He will hesitate more if the fortunes of his family are also hazarded; still more if it brings those of his neighbors into peril; most of all if it creates a national fear of peril and evokes a solemn and earnest protest from thousands of men who will be involved in spite of themselves in the hazards which he proposes to venture under the inspirations of a questionable hope.

WHY AM I SO TIRED?

Why Do I Feel So Weak and Run Down?

Your Poor Condition Is Made Worse by Nervous Debility. Science Proclaims a Certain Remedy.

You have lost your old-time snap and vim. Work that you used to do with ease now tires you. You often feel dull, dispirited and without ambition. You pass more or less sleepless nights, wake mornings tired and unrefreshed, have little or no appetite for breakfast, your head feels dull, there is a bad taste in the mouth, and your bowels are constipated. You go about your employment with a sense of weakness or weariness, and a distaste for taking hold of your work. Besides, you are nervous, irritable and often "blue" without apparent cause.

Then look at yourself.

Mrs. Andrew Mitchell, of 525 Kempton St., New Bedford, Mass., tells you that you can be cured as she was cured, when weak, tired and nervous.

MRS. ANDREW MITCHELL.

She took Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, finding that it improved her condition at once. She was so much benefited by the use of Dr. Greene's Nervura that she says she "cannot say enough in praise of it," and she urges all her friends to give it a trial.

This wonderful restorative, Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, will give back to the weakened and exhausted system the strength it has lost. It will impart strength and vigor to the brain and nerves, vitalize and invigorate all the physical powers and restore you again to that grand degree of lusty strength, of bounding pulse, and strong physical and nerve power, which, by overwork, ignorance or folly you have exhausted.

It is not a patent medicine but the prescription of the most successful specialist in curing nervous and chronic diseases, Dr. Greene, of 34 Temple Place, Boston, Mass., who can be consulted free of charge, personally or by letter.

Silver-Bug: "I tell you, the silver leaders are waging a fight for principle."

Gold-Bug: "Yes, and they stipulate in all their contracts that the principal shall be paid in gold."

First foreigner: "What do those people in the gallery mean by yelling rats?"

Second foreigner: "Those must be the cat calls of which we read."

"Gentlemen and fellow-citizens," exclaimed the silvery tongued stump speaker as he mounted an unadorned beer keg, "I would like to say that tonight I stand upon the platform of my party."

"I believe," said the candidate, "that my country calls me."

"If you are alludin' to that noise you hear just now," said the old farmer, "you air somewhat mistook. Hit wur nuthin' but the ole mule a-brayin' in the lot."

"Hiram," said Mrs Corntossel, "which kind o' money do you favor?"

"Well, Mandy," replied the old gentleman, "ter tell ye the truth, I kinder hate ter express any opinion. I've seen a lot o' fellers sit down an' worry 'bout makin' a ch'ice, an' the fus' thing they knew they didn' hev none of neither kind."

A. "To be sure."

B. "Then, after a while, you would be trying to get your money back. That's labor."

The New York Sun tells this of the Hon. Tim Campbell, who is running for Congress there:

"Fellow-citizens," he said, "ye's have had har-rd toimes, God knows, but vote for McKinley 'n Tim Campbell an' illict thim, an', mar-rk me wor-rds, the' pararies 'll blossom loike th' rose an' th' face of th' whole country 'll become loike th' vargin forrest."

"G'wan, Tim, I know ye's; an' phwat d'ye's know about vargin forrests? Phwat is a vargin forrest, Tim?" said a man in the crowd.

"A vargin forrest, ye ignoramus, is a forrest where th' hand of man niver put fut," said Tim.

We expect you to believe these people. When the first "Cloud of Witnesses" was published, thousands upon thousands of replies demonstrated that sufferers from Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchitis and Colds were reasonable persons and open to conviction. Are you open to conviction? We know that Hyomei, the new and wonderful Australian "Dry-Air" treatment, comprised in relieves 99 out of every 100 people who try it, and cures 99 out of every 100 who use it conscientiously and according to directions. Here are the indorsements of living men and women whom you must believe. The letters on their face have the stamp of sincerity as well as gratitude.

Bronchitis.

New York, Aug. 26, 1896.

My Dear Sir: I am very loath as a minister to give an endorsement to a patented article, but I feel it but just to you to say that I have used your Hyomei for Bronchitis with perfect success. I had a chronic cold last winter which stubbornly resisted every remedy for seven weeks. Your Hyomei gave me relief in one day, and enabled me to fill all my subsequent lecture dates with satisfaction.

(Rev.) Thomas Dixon, Jr.,
Pastor People's Church.

Clifton Forge, Va., May 14, 1896.

Dear Sir: The patient for whom I ordered Booth's Hyomei Pocket Inhaler, and who was suffering from Purulent Bronchitis, expectorating large quantities of purulent, offensive sputum, made a perfect recovery, and is now a healthy, robust young man.

R. S. Wiley, M.D.

Catarrh.

Newry, S. C., Aug. 12, 1896.

Dear Sir: I have used your Pocket Inhaler for Catarrh of the head and throat, and it has benefitted me wonderfully. I think there is nothing that equals it. I believe it is all that you claim it to be. I can highly recommend it to any one suffering from any kind of Catarrh.

W. W. Veal.

Colds.

Lyceum Theatre, London, Sept. 6, 1896.

Dear Sir: It is quite true that I am using the Hyomei Pocket Inhaler and I have the greatest pleasure in strongly recommending it.

Faithfully yours, Henry Irving.

Asthma.

New Haven, Conn., May 5, 1896.

I have given Hyomei a thorough test during the past winter, consequently I have been able to go to bed and sleep without being disturbed by my old enemy, Asthma. Hyomei should be in every home in the land.

L. A. Kimberley,
P. O. Box 1102.

Catarrhal Deafness.

23 Marshall St., Hartford, Conn., May 1, 1896.

I am doing wonders in the way of relieving cases of Catarrhal Deafness with your Hyomei. I have also cured several cases of throat troubles caused by Catarrh, which their physicians failed to relieve. The Sealer of Weights and Measures had a sore throat most of the time, caused by chemicals which he used. I cured his throat and he has been the means of selling about 20 Outfits.

J. B. Stone.

La Grippe.

The author of the $1,000 prize story "Titus" says:

Staten Island, March 6, 1896.

I have used Booth's Hyomei Pocket Inhaler in my family and find it invaluable as a preventive of Grippe, to break up colds, etc. I have used it to alleviate the painful cough and soreness resulting from measles with perfect success.

Florence M. Kingsley.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physcians, clergymen, public speakers, and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete by Mail, $1.00, to any part of the United States; for foreign countries, add $1.00 postage; outfit consists of pocket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm, for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute.

THE INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH LEAGUE.

IN SESSION AT HARTFORD, OCT. 20, 21.

The annual convention of the Open and Institutional Church League was held in the Fourth Church, Hartford, Ct., Oct. 20 and 21. A brighter, more comprehensive and abler set of addresses has never been heard at a church convention in this city. The league advocates open church doors for every day in the year and all the day, free seats, a plurality of Christian workers, the personal activity of all church members, and a ministry to all the community through educational, reformatory and philanthropic channels. Every address was based upon these expansive principles of a common fellowship.

Rev. H. H. Kelsey of the Fourth Church extended a cordial welcome. He had hoped to welcome them to a new church edifice, but it was significant that institutional church movements throughout the country had begun in down town churches, in old plants not well adapted for the work. Rev. Dr. C. L. Thompson of the Madison Avenue Church, New York, president of the league, in response said that the present was a critical time in the history of our country and men should spend much time in fighting out these questions upon their knees. There is no reason for the church being charged with so sacred a mission that it must be closed six days in the week. They should be open, and there should be something inside to attract those who need their ministrations. Do not invite them into the church unless you are doing business inside.

Rev. Dr. Richards of Philadelphia discussed the question Is the Church Fulfilling Its Mission? He made it plain by statistics that although the church has done a noble work, particularly within the last century, during which time 4,000,000 new members have been added and 23,000 new churches formed, it is not fulfilling its mission. It seems oftentimes as though conversion were a lost art. Statistics show that one-third of the Congregational churches in the country reported no additions on confession of faith in the last year. In Connecticut 14,000 church members worked for a whole year and converted but thirty-seven people. The great denominations were all by statistics shown to be only moderately successful. Two people out of every three you meet on the streets are outside of the churches, and one in twelve opposed to them.

Wednesday morning was taken up with reports from the various churches and with the business session. Mr. Kelsey described briefly the work of the Fourth Church, Hartford. The average attendance at the Sunday evening services is 1,000, one-third being men. The music is one of the features. Other speakers along this general line were Dr. Frank Russell of Bridgeport, Dr. J. C. Hill of Austin, Ill., Dr. F. M. North of New York.

Rev. Dr. E. B. Sanford of New York, in his report as corresponding secretary, said that a large proportion of the churches west of the Alleghenies are free. All the churches in New Britain, a neighboring city to Hartford, with a population of 30,000, are free. Nine-tenths of the Episcopal churches throughout the country are free. Even in conservative old New Haven one-half the churches are free. In speaking of the non-church-goers, he said that one-half the population, Protestant and Roman Catholic, do not attend church. The treasurer reported the year's expenses to have been $941, leaving a balance of $1 in the treasury.

Rev. Dr. E. D. Burr of the Ruggles Street (Baptist) Church, Boston, made the opening address of the afternoon session, speaking on The Spirit of Ministration as Exemplified in the Institutional Church. Anything without an outlet becomes stagnant. It is the duty of the church to transmit that which it receives. The institutional church can minister to the community by finding out its needs. In his own church a religious census is taken of the environment within a mile and a half and the work laid out in accordance with the needs thus found. Employment bureaus have been established, the care of children of the poor been bettered by instruction to their parents, a medical mission that has cared for 5,000 people within the year in some way or other by the dispensary, together with manual training and other useful departments, have been established, also industrial classes. The temperance problem, in the speaker's mind, was largely a question of food, and the temperance lecture that gets into a man the quickest is the one that goes into him from his dinner-pail, and the deathblow to the saloon is right there if rightly dealt. The whole idea of ministration must be based upon the scientific and accurate knowledge of the needs to which we are to minister. And with his every need ministered unto, the man will soon feel and see the manifestation of the spirit of Christ.

Some Things the Church May Do Toward Improving the Food and Nutrition of the Poor was the subject of an interesting discourse by Prof. W. O. Atwater of Wesleyan University. His remarks were based on his recent investigations under the authority of the Department of Agriculture, and a pamphlet is shortly to be issued that will be especially adapted for clergymen to use in connection with the work among the poor of their congregation. Professor Atwater's remarks were of great scientific value and illustrated the unconscious extravagance of poor folks in their selection of food.

Rev. Dr. William F. Blackman of the Yale Divinity School spoke on The Institutional Church in Its Relation to the Community. Nearly all our churches have taken on some form of institutional work. There should be the effort to enforce the continuous influence of the spirit in all the kingdoms of the home and the heart—an organized effort to possess the human life round about, all of it for the Master. But there must be something higher than philanthropy to feed and fashion the spirit of man. Things spiritual should always have the supremacy.

Rev. Dr. W. M. Paden of Philadelphia closed the afternoon session with a discussion of The Problem of Support. The giving of money for religious purposes always brings blessings to the church. It is a matter of self-sacrifice, meaning love and consecration. He congratulated the Fourth Church on its opportunity to build. But it is harder to raise money for the ordinary means of support than for the extraordinary means of building. His own church thirteen years ago had no property, but now has over a quarter of a million dollars in buildings and endowments. Part of the money was given by the church until it hurt, then the outsiders were asked and the money came.

Rev. Dr. C. A. Dickinson gave an address on The Institutional Church an Essential Factor in City Evangelization. The facts are appalling so far as non-church-going people are concerned. Between 30,000,000 and 40,000 000 people in this country do not enter churches at all. He had often made the unchallenged statement that not ten churches in Massachusetts could count ten men added in the last three years from the non-church-going population. He related many instances of institutional church work to show the important part that it plays in the city evangelization. Rev. S. P. Cadman of New York spoke on Institutional Churches and City Evangelization. The principal idea brought out was that evangelical workers had lost sight of the ethical developments that should follow. In closing, he presented a sketch of the work in the Metropolitan Temple in New York, of which he is pastor. E. D. C.

SPAULDING—In Groton, Oct. 16, Dr. Miles Spaulding, aged 77 yrs., 6 mos., 12 dys.

WELLS—In Oak Park, Ill., at the home of her daughter, Mrs. H. E. Humphrey, Sept. 30, Mrs. Emily Taylor Wells, widow of Rev. Moses H. Wells, late of Northfield, Mass., aged 65 yrs. She was a native of Hinsdale, N. H., and in early years a successful teacher in Denmark and Muscatine, Io. In these homes, and in the places of her husband's pastoral service, she was warmly esteemed for her gentle spirit and earnest, devoted Christian character.

MARY FARWELL PINKERTON.

The announcement of the sudden death of Miss Mary F. Pinkerton, at her home in Derry, N. H., brought sorrow to a wide circle of relatives and friends.

She was known for many years as one of the most gifted teachers in New England, and her associate teachers and pupils will ever be thankful that they had her friendship and instruction. She possessed a mind of singular clearness, richly stored with knowledge, and of late years her lectures upon various epochs in history, given in Boston, Concord and other places, have shown her great intellectual power.

Yet not alone for these mental endowments will her memory be cherished but for the union of these with the highest Christian character. Her life was rich in faith and in its spiritual insight, noble in its devotion to duty, fruitful in its influence. She has entered into rest, and we are comforted in our loss, knowing how "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

MISS MARTHA J. ADAMS.

At the home of her niece, Mrs. (Rev.) C. D. Merrill, in Beloit, Wis., Miss Martha J. Adams fell asleep in Jesus, Oct 7, from a second attack of paralysis, aged seventy-five years and three months. Her first attack was at Tillitson Institute, Austin, Tex., Jan 7, 1896. Her remains were brought to the home of her sister, Mrs. (Rev) H. H. Benson, Wauwatosa, and after appropriate funeral services were laid to rest in Forrest Home Cemetery, Milwaukee.

WILLIAM BARNEY CHILDS

His mercantile interests connected him with the dry goods business in Chelsea, Vt., Lebanon, Wentworth and Concord, N. H., Worcester and Boston, Mass. In 1883 he was married to Miss Fannie R. Emerson of Concord, N. H., who died in 1891. Four children survive him, Helen E., twelve years; William A., ten years; Robert B., eight years; and Fannie R., five years old. By JOHN FISKE. Illustrated Edition. Containing 22 photogravures of portraits and paintings, 15 colored maps and plates, and 280 text cuts and maps. 2 vols., 8vo, $8.00.

Large-Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies, printed on English hand-made paper, 2 vols., large 8vo, $16.00, net.

Chapters from a Life.

By ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, author of "A Singular Life," "The Gates Ajar," etc. With 24 portraits and other illustrations. 12mo, $1.50.

This is a remarkably attractive book of biographical and literary interest. It describes her girlhood, her entrance into the field of literature, her life at East Gloucester, and gives glimpses, sometimes full views, of Longfellow, Holmes, Whittier, Mr. Fields, Bishop Brooks, Mrs. Thaxter, Miss Larcom, Mrs. Lydia Maria Child and others. The book is delightfully written, printed on excellent paper, and very tastefully bound.

Cape Cod.

By HENRY D. THOREAU. Holiday Edition. Illustrated in water colors by Miss AMELIA M. WATSON. 2 vols., crown 8vo, very handsomely bound from designs by Mrs. WHITMAN, $5.00.

Thoreau's unequaled description of Cape Cod is supplemented by a hundred admirable illustrations, printed in colors on the margins. Their great variety, the happy choice of subjects, and their high artistic character, make this a notable holiday book.

Marm Lisa.

By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN, author of "The Birds' Christmas Carol," etc. 16mo, $1.00.

Little Marm Lisa is a fresh child-figure in fiction. The very interesting story describes the quickening of her clouded and burdened life till her pathetic faithfulness ripens, in the climax, into heroism. It is the longest story, and one of the best, Mrs. Wiggin has written.

The Country of the Pointed Firs.

By SARAH ORNE JEWETT, author of "The Life of Nancy," "A White Heron," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

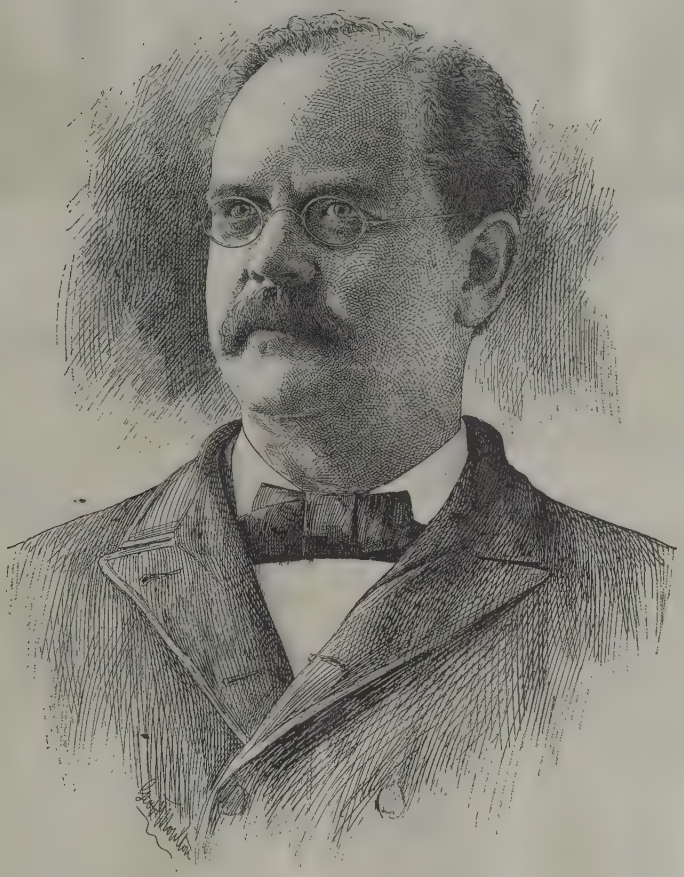
THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 5 November 1896



REV. GEORGE C. ADAMS, D.D.

The new pastor of the First Church, San Francisco.

CONGREGATIONAL Christianity, with its noble past, has a yet more noble future, and only needs to be thoroughly united for aggressive work in the name of the Master to prove itself to be not only the nearest in its polity to the church of the New Testament, but the one that is most capable of receiving and using the gift of the Holy Spirit. If this is sectarianism it is of a kind that can be held without detriment to love for all the Church of God everywhere, and is much needed now for the development of the mighty reserved forces which, unless all the signs of the times are misleading, are about to be called into play in the great climax of the church on earth.—From A Christian Lawyer, by Dr. Adams.

Charles Scribner's Sons' Announcement of New Books Includes the Following:

SENTIMENTAL TOMMY.

The Story of his Boyhood. By JAMES M. BARRIE. With 11 full-page Illustrations by William Hatherell. 12mo, $1.50.

"There is every reason to think that 'Sentimental Tommy,' J. M. Barrie's story, is going to have a wider interest than any he has written, with, perhaps, the one exception of 'The Little Minister.' Personally we prefer the new story. The subtle mixture of humor and pathos is unusual, even with this master of those qualities."—The Critic.

THE LAST QUARTER CENTURY IN THE UNITED STATES—1870-1895.

By E. BENJAMIN ANDREWS, President of Brown University. With 350 Illustrations. 2 vols., 8vo, $6.00.

President Andrews's work is absolutely unique. Never before have the many history-making events of this period been gathered together in a historical narrative by a competent hand. The illustrations, prepared at a great expense, are remarkable for their combination of artistic charm with absolute historical accuracy. Since its publication in SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE the History has been thoroughly revised and increased in size almost one-half, with 100 additional illustrations.

MRS. CLIFF'S YACHT.

By FRANK R. STOCKTON. Illustrated by A. Forestier. 12mo, $1.50.

"Nowhere have Mr. Stockton's powers been exerted with better effect than in this book. In its quaint humor and its romantic adventure it makes a very noticeable book indeed, and one which cannot fail to widen its author's reputation."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

THE EDGE OF THE ORIENT. By ROBERT HOWARD RUSSELL. With 130 Illustrations, chiefly from photographs. 12mo, $2.00.

THE SPRIGHTLY ROMANCE OF MARSAC. By MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL. Illustrated by Gustave Verbeek. 12mo, $1.25.

FOUR EXPERT OPINIONS—THOUSANDS SIMILAR.

Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst.—"The Encyclopædia Dictionary is a library condensed into four volumes; a ton of diffusiveness reduced to forty pounds of quintessence, and, withal, as delicate in detail as it is comprehensive in contents."

"The Churchman," New York.—"This dictionary is as 'up-to-date' as one could be made. Its topics are treated with a fullness and minuteness which enables it to take the place of any encyclopædia."

"Scientific American," New York.—"It forms in itself a library for the busy man of affairs, the mechanic ambitious to advance himself in his line, or the student or apprentice just making a beginning."

From Ex-Judge Noah Davis, LL.D.—"It has no superior in any of the qualities that make up a good dictionary. To these qualities it adds a fund of encyclopædic knowledge which I have never before seen in such a work. I give it my hearty commendation."

Adopted as the Standard in Public Schools Throughout the Country.

NEW WORLD PILGRIMS
AT OLD WORLD SHRINES

The Book of The Pilgrimage.

An account of the remarkable tour of last summer to England and Holland under the auspices of THE CONGREGATIONALIST.

It was originally intended to publish this book exclusively for the use of the members of the party, but so many inquiries have come to us from other sources for a permanent record of the trip that we have decided to print a limited number of additional copies.

SUBSCRIPTIONS WILL BE RECEIVED UNTIL DEC. 1 AT $2.00 PER COPY—OR, SECURELY PACKED AND DELIVERED POSTPAID, $2.25. AFTER DEC. 1 THE PRICE WILL BE $3.00. THE BOOK WILL NOT BE FOR SALE AT THE BOOKSTORES AND THERE ARE NO TRADE OR MINISTERIAL DISCOUNTS. THE PRICE WILL BE UNIFORMLY AS ABOVE.

THE BOOK OF THE PILGRIMAGE

Is a sumptuous quarto, printed on heavy coated paper, wide margins, uncut edges, and bound in white parchment paper. The text is accompanied by over sixty illustrations, many of them full-page, and about seventy portraits of distinguished men and women in England, to whom, as hosts, the Pilgrimage Party was indebted. In addition to this there are four group pictures of the party, including two of double-page size. There are over one hundred facsimile autographs, many of them of great interest, and including a characteristic letter of Ian Maclaren. The initial letters for each chapter have been drawn by Ipsen, who also supplied designs for the title-page, frontispiece, and finis.

The volume will be of unique interest, and worthy of the journey it chronicles, a journey which assumed an international significance and which cannot fail to have an important denominational value.

The book will be ready about Dec. 4, 1896

 It may be found necessary to close the $2.00 subscription list previous to Dec. 1. The publishers reserve this right in view of the fact that the book is printed from type and the edition necessarily a limited one.

EVERY young church will find suggestions in Dr. Henry A. Stimson's sermon which we print this week. In view of the fact that every week witnesses the formation of a number of new churches, it has seemed to us fitting that a discourse intended originally for the new Manhattan Church in New York city should be given a wider audience. It sets forth certain principles and ideals which may well be kept in mind by all churches, whether young or old. A restatement of Christian faith, the adoption of modern methods, the striving for closer fellowship with other bodies of Christians and the effort after a more strenuous Christian life are worthy ambitions for any church. Yet such intentions ought to be particularly congenial to a band of men and women coming for the first time into covenant with each other and with Christ. Charter membership in a new church is a great privilege and opportunity. The members of our new church in New York city are comprehending this fact, and may be expected to realize to some extent at least the high ideals of growth and service which are being exalted before them.

Ex-Senator Henry L. Dawes celebrated his eightieth birthday last Friday and received the congratulations of hosts of friends. He has rarely made a more vigorous and able speech than he did a few weeks ago at Lake Mohonk on the condition in the Indian Territory; and in his long and useful public life he has perhaps done no more valuable service than he is now doing in bringing order and justice into the tangled affairs of that country. Senator Morrill of Vermont at eighty-six has just been re-elected to another term of six years in the United States Senate. Dr. Temple at seventy five has been appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. Gladstone at eighty-six is still one of the most prominent figures in English political life. Dr. R. S. Storrs at seventy-five is speaking as forcefully and eloquently as at any time in his life. Such men grow more valuable as their experience increases, nor are they less appreciated because their years are many. Who would not, by temperate living and unselfish service, strive to attain a noble old age?

Armenian refugees are being admitted to this country. To shut the door in their faces would be a sad comment on the sympathy expressed for their race in the many public meetings which have been held for the purpose. It would give the lie to the almost unanimous utterances of the press, and it would shame American Christianity. It may not be too much for our Government to require bonds of $100 each for them. We ought not to create precedents to plague us hereafter when undesirable immigrants crowd on our shores. But there are plenty of sympathizers with these persecuted people who should be ready to furnish these bonds. They are not likely to become a public charge. Numerous offers are being made to receive them into American homes. A physician promises to bring up a boy in his own profession, a gardener agrees to do the same for another boy, a lady offers to teach one to be a household servant and a young artisan is willing to share his home with an Armenian youth. In a private letter Miss Frances E. Willard writes us that these are specimens of many proposals received. This is practical Christianity. We are sure that there are hundreds of welcomes of this sort ready to be extended to the men and women who, because of their faith, are being driven by murderous persecutors from their homes in Turkey.

We have received many letters commending The Congregationalist for maintaining that religious papers and leaders should use their influence for certain righteous principles in this political campaign now ended. But they were all from persons who belonged to the party which especially professes to defend these principles. We have received several letters attributing to us utterances which cannot be found in our columns and rebuking us for interfering in politics when our proper mission is to promote religion. But they nearly all contain in addition reasons pressed with emphasis for voting for candidates whose election we have not advocated. Now that the campaign is over we presume we can discuss these same principles of government and their influence on the welfare of the nation without seeming to depart from our mission as a religious newspaper. For it will now hardly be denied that Christians must consider their duties as citizens, and that they may reasonably expect to be aided in so doing by their religious journals.

Herod has been execrated as a monster during all Christian history because he murdered the infants of Bethlehem. Mr. Nathan Strauss of New York has, during the last summer, saved the lives of many times as many infants as Herod destroyed. He has done this by distributing sterilized milk for their food. Elisha raised a dead boy to life by breathing into his mouth. He saved a number of theological students from being poisoned by making wholesome the poisonous food they were eating. He healed a leper by prescribing for him certain baths in the Jordan. He made the vile water of the spring at Jericho good by putting salt into it. All these acts, it is said, were merely symbolical, the power being wholly of the Lord. But when men learn the secrets of nature and use them to make poisonous milk healthful by sterilizing it and to destroy the germs of disease in the air we breathe and the water we drink are they any less truly serving the Lord than was his prophet? And is the power which saves less really from God, or have we any less reason to thank him because through greater knowledge how to use his gifts thousands of his children every year are delivered from the power of disease and death?

In his letter resigning the college pastorate at Amherst, Rev. J. E. Tuttle, D. D., questioned the desirability of committing to one man the responsibility for the college pulpit and for the department of Biblical literature. It is apparent to any one that distinctively different qualities are required for success in each of these fields. It is not disparagement of Dr. Tuttle's excellent work at Amherst, or of that of his predecessors, to say that they would have felt much freer had they not been expected to perform a kind of double duty. The college pastorate is a great problem at every institution, but some simplification of it would come, in our opinion, if the best man available could be secured for the Biblical work in college, and another man, or a group of men in rotation, be obtained to preach, to cultivate personal relations with all the students and, in short, to fulfill the specific and important duties of the college pastorate. With the enlargement of the college curriculum to include more work in the English Bible and the Semitic languages, and with the training of special men to teach along these lines, there ought to be some special provision for such departments and such provision ought to be made entirely independent of the incumbent's fitness for pulpit work.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC DRIFT IN THE UNITED STATES.

The pope privately disapproves of Archbishop Ireland's utterance on political issues. So says a dispatch from Rome. The pope disapproves of several things in the United States. He disapproves of our public school system. He does not like to have Catholic children attend the public schools. Yet they do attend them in large numbers, even where parochial schools stand open to receive them and where the clergy use all their influence to induce parents to send their children to the church school.

The clergy themselves are not united on many questions. The Catholic Church in the United States has a conservative party and a liberal party, and they often come into sharp opposition to each other. No orders from the pope will force them to agree. Dr. J. M. Buckley, the stalwart Methodist, was once traveling by night in a Pullman sleeping car. In the opposite berth was Bishop Coxe of the Protestant Episcopal Church. There was a collision, and the two clergymen were pitched into the aisle, their heads coming violently together. "This," said Dr. Buckley, "is Christian unity perforce." "I deny it," said the bishop. "Only our heads came together. There can be no real unity unless both heads and hearts are united." The pope by his fiat may bring the heads of his clergy together, but that will only emphasize their differences.

Neither the clergy nor the laity will consent to submit their judgment in matters pertaining to citizenship to the decision of a foreign ruler. The pope is wise enough not to insist on this. American Catholics decide for themselves concerning issues such as have arisen during the present political campaign. Vicar-General Byrne says, "It is difficult to see how they could be judged at such a distance, in view of the fact that our bishops and clergy here have found themselves unable to agree." If political independence is maintained by Catholics, one of the chief reasons why Protestants fear the Roman Church in this country is removed.

The conditions are such that this independence is almost certain to increase. The Roman Catholic Church in this country takes on a character suited to its environment. Ignorance creates and maintains dependence. Ignorance fosters superstition. Education makes people think for themselves. It dissipates superstition. Free schools, compulsory education, manhood suffrage, make it impossible that the Roman Church in the United States should be what it is in countries where its main constituency is an illiterate peasantry. It is well for our republic that priests should be educated here and not at Rome. We welcome the growth of the Catholic University at Washington, and the awakened desire among Catholics for the improvement of their theological seminaries. It is not possible to hold thought in these institutions in the narrow ecclesiastical channels of the Old World. Their students and teachers feel the influence of our free atmosphere. They respond to the free pulses of American life. They are citizens, and are compelled by their manhood to accept the responsibility of citizenship. The pope removes Bishop Keane from his place at the head of the Catholic University, but he remains a director, and the names presented by the directors, from which the Vatican is to choose his successor, are men of his own type, because they know that men out of sympathy with American life cannot succeed there.

The pope is an absolute monarch. Probably he disapproves of republics. But he has shown himself a farsighted statesman, and he will no doubt accept such a degree of independence as he must among his subjects in America. Nowhere is the Roman Catholic Church more prosperous than here. Nowhere, probably, does it yield larger revenues to the papal treasury. Its gain in numbers is mainly by immigration. But it is increasing in wealth and intelligence. It has produced many patriotic, and some eminent, citizens. The chief danger which many fear from the Roman Church in the United States lies in the efforts of a foreign power to hold absolute control over it. The differences between its leaders, maintained, as they are, with calmness and dignity, do no real injury to the church. They give it standing in the republic. They reassure those who view it with suspicion. They help it to maintain more securely its hold on its members. The public school system which it resists works to its advantage. Free education, lower and higher, with liberty among its priests and laymen in the expression of opinion, is a necessity to the Roman Catholic Church in the United States.

BISMARCK'S MISTAKE.

For his own sake and for that of European peace Prince Bismarck should refrain from disturbing utterances. Personal dignity and the responsibility which inevitably attaches to a man holding his relation to the politics of the past generation ought to control his tongue more firmly. If it be true, as it seems to be, that he has lately declared that "for years previous to 1890 there was a secret understanding between Germany and Russia in contravention of the agreement on which the Triple Alliance or Dreibund is based," the statement is at once discreditable to him and to his nation and is certain to promote international distrust at a time when mutual respect and confidence are exceptionally needed.

If his statement be correct it proves that Germany was treating her two allies in the Triple Alliance, or Russia, or all three of them treacherously. And, as he was the moving spirit in German statesmanship, it means that Prince Bismarck was guilty of an insincerity which may have been a common feature of international dealings formerly, but which no longer is "good politics" and which never was justifiable morally. Indeed, he himself often has boasted of his success in following the policy of merely declaring openly what he purposed. He has posed habitually as the frank, blunt statesman whose word could be depended upon. Now he confesses that he was only posing after all.

What the world may think of him personally, however, is but a minor matter. He has raised the question whether German assent to a treaty can be depended upon, and has awakened afresh suspicion that international agreements in general have not the trustworthiness which they are assumed to have. The German Government has made haste to deny his statement but probably few will doubt its substantial accuracy. Distrust of Germany must be a natural consequence and considerable embarrassment of the German emperor and his cabinet. The peace of Europe, too uncertainly assured at the best at present, has been rendered the harder to be preserved.

Prince Bismarck seems to have yielded to an impulse to remind the German rulers of his existence and enduring influence by seizing an opportunity of putting them in a tight place, regardless of consequences. But his utterance must injure him gravely, whatever else it may or may not accomplish. It is a pity that so great a man and one whose career has been on the whole so noble should have made so sad a revelation of weakness.

WHAT ARE THE CHURCHES THINKING ABOUT?

The season of autumnal religious gatherings is nearly ended. During the last six weeks we have printed reports of these assemblies—local, State and national—representing the Congregational churches of the entire country. These reports are worthy the attention of Christian students, for they indicate in what measure the Holy Spirit is in the churches and what he is doing through them. They invite the attention of students of sociology, for they illustrate the movements of the most potent forces for the moral uplifting of all classes of human society.

These churches are thinking about helping their fellowmen. They are trying to do it, too. Whether or not they are open to the charge of being of the world, it is certain that they were never more thoroughly in the world than now. If one wishes to promote reforms, to help the poor, to increase patriotism, to cultivate social relations, to aid missions at home or abroad or to advance general culture, in the majority of our churches he may join a society to do any one of these things. Never were there so many organizations within the church as now, and many of them are subdivided into committees which look after the daily and almost hourly life of those willing to accept their aid. Portions of the Bible are selected for their daily reading and their weekly study. They are invited to pledge themselves to private prayers and public worship and to regular duties in a system almost as thorough as that which ruled the monasteries of the middle ages.

The churches are acting in more thorough union than ever before. Local societies are made parts of larger bodies. Not only Sunday school and Christian Endeavor, but King's Daughters and King's Sons, temperance societies, reading circles and good government clubs have general officers and branches in each local church. Denominationally we are strengthening ourselves. We do our educational and charitable work through societies which represent all the churches. Centralization, which formerly had to contend with active opposition, is now hindered only by indifference.

Congregationalists are extending practical church union beyond denominational lines. Co operation is gaining ground over competition. We recognize the fact that there are movements to help what are called the defective classes, whose claims extend beyond our denomination, beyond the whole Christian Church, and we unite with all friends of humanity to benefit society. The church no longer claims the exclusive right to do good to men, no longer claims that real good cannot be done except through it. It is willing to be a factor with others in advancing the material and moral interests of mankind.

These things become patent in studying the topics discussed in recent religious gatherings. Not less significant are the omitted topics and those which have only slight attention. Biblical interpretation has less prominence than it had five years ago. Individual self-culture in Christian life is not emphasized. Doctrines which have been made dividing lines have nearly or quite disappeared. If tests of discipleship are considered they are works, not faith. If faith is thought of, it is that which may be inferred from works.

So far as we may judge from the reports of these autumnal meetings, the churches are fixing their thoughts on the present time and present needs. They are thinking of this world, not of the next. They are not much moved by the fear of hell or the hope of heaven. They want to make this world better and to do it now. They would avoid sin because it degrades character. They do not much emphasize a dread of the wrath of God because of sin. They want righteousness because it makes men worthy. They do not so much think of God's love for righteous men, as the reward of their righteousness, as they think of God's love for all men. They are not thinking of the bliss of the holy nor the misery of the wicked in the future life. They are thinking of the excellence of realizing ethical standards here and now, and they are striving to attain to them.

We have not written these things for the sake either of congratulation or criticism, but to point out what appears to be the present attitude of the churches. Such a study as is here suggested of a passing phase of Christian life may turn the thought of the churches to most important things, for the time forgotten. It can hardly be doubted that certain great motives which held possession of Christians in the last generation are now but dimly seen in the background of organized enterprise to improve human society.

JESUS, THE DIVINE SAVIOUR.

It is well-nigh impossible for us to understand the whole difference in respect to their idea of God which the coming of Jesus Christ made to those who accepted him. Before that day they had believed in God as a supreme Creator and Ruler, and had not been without a partial comprehension of his fatherhood. But to this truth they never had done anything like justice. And they had formed no adequate conception, if any at all, of what it means to have the Spirit of God so dominant in a common human life as to saturate and color and shape it hour by hour with never a lapse or a lack. It took them some time to see the actual revelation of God to men in Jesus, and some of them never got their eyes fully opened to it. But many saw it and wondered and praised God.

It was not so much the divine power or even the divine wisdom, illustrated by Jesus, which was the special revelation of God, as the fact that he embodied divine goodness in a human form. Nobody could realize this without being positively influenced. Some were drawn to him by the loveliness and noble force of his character. Some, whose natures loved evil rather than righteousness, were repelled and hated him because they could not but feel the difference between him and them. But primarily by the lofty, stainless, peerless beauty of his soul and life and also by the harrowing yet pathetically touching death which he died for the world, he has been steadily drawing all men unto himself throughout the ages. Not yet complete, this process of attraction and submission now moves ever more swiftly, surely and on a larger scale.

To those who become his he gives eternal life. It is theirs now. It is not to be waited for until death opens a door into it. We enter upon it when we become one with him. He takes us up upon the great swelling current of life and light and joy which springs from him and of which he is not only the fountain but the guide, and bears us along upon it triumphantly. To be one in spirit and purpose with him, to try loyally to think his thoughts and do his deeds in penitent gratitude and humble love—this is to have eternal life, even as he has it.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Religious Teachers and the Crisis.

Such a campaign with such issues could not fail to interest the clergy profoundly, hence some of the incidents of the last week of it are not so surprising as they might seem at another time. The clergymen of Worcester marched in the sound money parade there on Saturday, and so did most of the professors and students at Hartford Theological Seminary in their similar local demonstration. Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie of The Outlook was colonel of the detachment of sixteen companies representing the religious press, which marched in the great parade in New York described in another paragraph. Cardinal Gibbons, in the Baltimore cathedral, felt it his duty on Sunday to speak from his pulpit, counseling moderation of feeling and optimism whatever the result might be. In most of the Protestant Episcopal churches of the land a special prayer was offered appropriate as a means of impressing worshipers with their duties as Christian citizens and their dependence on God for light and strength in times of national peril. Drs. Parkhurst, W. R. Huntington, Collyer, Dix and Thompson of New York, and President Patton of Princeton, as well as many other ministers, spoke valiant words for the old-time national ideals. Dr. Munger of New Haven asserted his right to pass upon the ethical questions involved, and denounced with holy anger the divisive "class cries" of Mr. Bryan's latest speeches. In Boston there were but few pulpits in which there were no pertinent allusions to the duty of the voter, and some went so far as to urge their hearers to vote against Mr. Bryan. One and all rose above mere partisan differences or disagreements on details of financial policy, and decried the rise in this country of a party so radical as to attack time-honored, time-tested institutions. Dr. Parkhurst defined the situation thus:

> The one thing which the solid, intelligent integrity of the country has to do this week is to grind its heel relentlessly and unpityingly into the viperous head that is lifting itself up in venomous antagonism, not only to this Government, but in venomous antagonism to all government. We recognize the wrongs that need to be righted. We appreciate the burdens too heavy to be borne which the tyranny of wealth in too many cases has buckled upon the tired shoulders of the poor, and no man living would throw himself more whole heartedly than myself into the task of trying to unbuckle those burdens and to heal the bruises they have wrought, but the first question that is upon us, and the one we have to meet this week, is one that reaches further than the righting of individual wrongs. It is a question that pierces to the very marrow of the whole matter of government, of an authoritative framework sufficiently established and robust to make of any permanent avail any effort that we might put forth to the relief of those who are wronged. . . . It is no longer a question of gold versus silver, nor is it a question whether we will respect this authority or whether we will respect that authority, but whether we will submit to any authority. It is a question that is plowing ruthlessly into the quivering vitals of our constitutional life as a great people, and is bloodthirstingly menacing the permanence of our institutions. As the purposes animating it have grown in intensity it has let slip off the robes of propriety and legality which it had considerately assumed, and stands forth today in no considerable part of this constituency in the frankness of anarchistic nakedness.

The Campaign Ends.

The campaign practically ended Saturday night, when the chairmen of the national committees issued their final instructions to their subordinates and their final estimates as to the results of the election. Mr. Jones of the Democratic National Committee predicted that Mr. Bryan would receive 327 votes in the electoral college, and Mr. Hanna of the Republican National Committee estimated that Mr. Bryan would receive only 136 votes. Ere this is read the comparative merits of these gentlemen in the rôle of prophet will have been determined. Up to Sunday morning, when he arrived at his home in Lincoln, Mr. Bryan had traveled about 17,000 miles since he began his tour as a candidate for the suffrages of his fellow-citizens, and had spoken in twenty-seven States of the Union. Nothing like this has ever been known in our history. Quite as remarkable, though in a very different way, has been Mr. McKinley's record. When he made his last speech, and that to his neighbors in Canton, Monday evening, he had spoken from his own doorstep more than 250 times to delegations of representative men from all walks of life, all sections of the country. When it is remembered that almost every word that Messrs. McKinley and Bryan have spoken has been sent broadcast to the people through the city dailies and country weeklies, when it is recalled that for the last two months an army of 17,300 speakers has been speaking for the Republican candidates every night in twelve of the Interior States, when it is considered that, in addition to all this, men and journals—as Mr. Bryan pointed out in his Ottumwa speech—that usually forswear politics have this year thought of little else, it becomes apparent that this has been a campaign of education.

Flag Day.

Who says that symbolism has not its beneficent and inspiring uses? Who says that the American people are without imagination and are grossly materialistic? Let such, if such there be, contemplate the enthusiasm and generous expenditure of time and money which entered into the national celebration of Flag Day last Saturday, and forever after hold their peace. Purely the response of individuals to the suggestion of other individuals, it will stand out through all time as the most picturesque and beautiful incident of a campaign phenomenal in so many other respects. The rich and the poor, the learned and the unlearned, Republicans and Democrats, Populists and Prohibitionists, churches and clubs, factories and residences, had on them or floating over them the stars and stripes. It was inevitable that here and there there should be the attempt to convert the national emblem into a partisan device, for many men's passions and convictions have been stirred as they were in 1861–1865, and of course in a broad sense it is always true that if one party is patriotic the other is more so. Events and the verdict of history determine which. But after all, the significance of last Saturday's celebration was in the fact that it was a concrete expression of the popular conviction that Nov. 3 was to be a day of profound solemnity, when men were to act as patriots, not as partisans.

The Business Men's Parades.

When the history of this campaign comes to be written by one who can deal adequately with it, he will discover as soon as he sorts over his data and begins his work that he must reckon with a force which never before has been so omnipotent in ordering the details of the fight or influencing its result. He will find that the merchants, the traders, the manufacturers and business men of the country, whether they live North or South, East or West, have as a rule resolutely opposed the Chicago platform and its candidates. To win a triumph they have contributed all their characteristic energy, ability, fertility of resource and so much of their means as seemed necessary for legitimate purposes. Much of their work has been done through the Republican machine, which, it must ever be borne in mind, has been constructed and operated in this campaign by a business man, Mr. Hanna, and not by a veteran politician. But far the most effective share of their work has been done through nonpartisan organizations, created to carry on the campaign. Printed matter by the ton has been printed and circulated. Speakers by the thousand have been kept on the stump. Letters to and from correspondents in remote regions have been flying back and forth, solidifying sentiment and breaking down former sectional and partisan prejudices. In short, so much has been done, and it has been done in such a way, that it would scarcely be a misnomer to call this a business men's campaign, and that too without giving to the term "business men" the broad interpretation given to it by Mr. Bryan. Of course if this be true, and if it also be true that it has been a campaign fought to secure justice and maintain righteousness, then it follows that our business men are idealists, not materialists.

How unanimous business men were in the contest was proved by their demonstrations in many of our cities last Saturday. The streets of New York, Boston, St. Louis, Providence and Worcester—not to mention others—resounded to the tramp of thousands of their most substantial merchants. New York's parade was the largest civic parade ever held anywhere. Led by Gen. Horace Porter and reviewed by Mayor Strong, ex-Mayor Hewitt and Hon. Garrett A. Hobart, for eight hours 100,000 of the city's typical business men marched up Broadway and Fifth Avenue, applauded by thousands of sightseers and sympathizers and inspired by the martial music of bands, the cheers of the multitude and the dazzling, resplendent display of flags and patriotic regalia.

Who Shall Lead and Whither?

The French Parliament opened last week; calmly for it. The British Parliament will renew its sitting this week, and once more wrestle with the problem of state aid for schools, and the interminable Irish land question. Great Britain's foreign policy must soon be revealed, for feeling is at fever heat respecting Armenia, and there is an intense desire to hear that the dispute with the United States has been settled. Lord Salisbury's Guild Hall speech, Nov. 9, will, it is thought, furnish him with an opportunity to set forth his acts and his intentions. Strife within the Liberal party over the question of leadership continues, and does not augur well for the party or the empire. Rev. J. Guinness Rogers upholds Lord Rosebery; Rev. Hugh Price Hughes attacks him savagely. The Daily News defends him. The Chronicle, The Spectator, The Speaker and The British Weekly attack him. Sir Vernon Harcourt professes loyalty to Lord Rosebery, but differs from him radically, and of the last Liberal cabinet few are, or could become, hearty lieutenants of the man who looms up above all others as the great parliamentary leader of his party, Sir Vernon Harcourt.

Bismarck's Revelations.

Elsewhere the ethical import of Bismarck's revelations are discussed. Suffice it to say here that they have done much to aggravate the situation in Europe, and have delayed, we fear, any understanding which the Powers may have been approaching respecting Turkey, and there were signs of such before this bombshell exploded. Taken together with the London Chronicle's exposure of the details of the French-Russian treaty, showing that it is purely defensive, and Lord Rosebery's free and easy interpretation of the validity of the Cyprus convention, it can scarcely be said that the peoples of Europe have much reason to put faith in diplomats and their treaties nowadays. Both the old triple alliance and the new dual alliance have had much of their stability and authority undermined by these revelations. It will not be strange if Great Britain hesitates before she seeks to bind herself to any alliance with partners who are so given to duplicity. The tide was running strongly toward an Anglo-Russian understanding prior to these revelations. The French people will not be so enthusiastic over the Russian alliance when once they become convinced that it can be counted upon solely for defense, not for offense against Germany. Austria surely will not consider Germany's present professions of friendship as worth much unless she receives unquestionable proof that the emperor's foreign policy is more straightforward than Bismarck's is now proved to have been. Italy has already given evidence of rapprochement with France and Russia. What then becomes of the triple alliance? And if that breaks with what Power can Germany ally herself? Russia alone emerges scatheless, the master of the field, every new development revealing more clearly her supremacy. Witness the statement that she has an understanding with Denmark, by which in case of war Denmark's harbors and ports commanding the Baltic are at Russia's command.

NOTES.

If imitation be sincerest flattery then the fact that the British North Atlantic squadron was never larger or more formidable than now is proof of the recent growth and present strength of our navy.

The news that Japan is supplying the rebels in Manilla with arms is not surprising. Japan has an eye out for colonial expansion, and one of her ablest political journals recently announced the Japanization of the Philippines as a plank in its platform.

Is it too much to expect that men who have sunk partisan differences during this campaign can be equally public spirited when Congress meets, so that it need not be recorded much oftener that the deficit in our national income for the quarter is many million dollars? For the quarter ending Oct. 31 the deficit is not far from $32,500,000.

Bostonians have no special reason to be glad that the manufacture of gas within its limits is to pass under the monopolistic control of the Standard Oil Company, but neither are they grieving much because they have passed out from the position of dependence upon Mr. Addicks of Delaware, who may be a great man there, but is not in Massachusetts.

There are some signs of improvement in the situation at Constantinople. Russia seems to be acting in concert with the other Powers, hence promises of reforms are renewed, the sultan even going so far as to promise Christian governors for Armenia. On the other hand, there are signs of an appeal by the sultan to the fanatical devotion of his Mohammedan subjects, and the plundering of Armenians goes on by alleged process of law even when massacre is not rampant. The vessels of our navy remain together off Smyrna.

The Cuban revolution drags along, and few Americans realize the intensity of purpose with which Cubans are fighting for freedom. Maceo, the chief of the insurgents, has had nine brothers who have died fighting for the independence of their country, and he, the oldest, is the only survivor. With such memories, no wonder he and his followers are not easily conquered. The latest reports from Cuba intimate that within sixty days Maceo will lay siege to Havana. Our consul-general in Cuba, Fitz-Hugh Lee, is now on his way to this country with important revelations which may bring on a crisis soon.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Chronicle says he looks in vain in the columns of the German newspapers for the sign of a noble attitude on the Armenian question. The local authorities in many of the German towns have ordered the church authorities to desist from collecting funds for the relief of Armenians. Mr. James Bryce, M. P., in a letter to Die Nation, recently wrote:

It seems strange that the news of such cruelties, perpetrated at the end of the nineteenth century, by a government responsible by treaty to the six Powers for the protection of its Christian subjects, should not have evoked from the German people a general cry of indignation and roused them to see that the powerful influence of Germany was exerted to secure the cessation of such horrors. We are forced to suppose that the facts have not yet been fully brought to the knowledge of your countrymen, whose generous hearts would surely respond to the cry of the oppressed.

IN BRIEF.

In view of the celebration next week of the completion by Dr. Storrs of his fifty years pastorate in Brooklyn, we shall publish several interesting articles relating to Dr. Storrs and his noble service for the church and for humanity.

That Book of the Pilgrimage, which our publisher announces in another column, and upon whose literary and artistic features great care has been expended, will enshrine in a beautiful and permanent form the salient events of a truly notable journey.

A church and college of the Greek Church was dedicated in Minneapolis last week by Bishop Nicholas, head of the church in America, Alaska and the Aleutian Islands. Thus does this country become more and more conspicuously the home of various faiths.

Twelve of the fifteen members of the executive committee of the A. M. A. were in attendance at the recent jubilee meeting. That shows a devotion to the society which is not limited by perfunctory attendance on the monthly meetings at the Bible House.

A railway conductor on the branch road between Boston and Dedham has daily gone to and fro over the same route for more than fifty-one years. Mr. Moses Boyd is probably the oldest conductor in the world, and during his business life the advance in means of travel has been greater than during all the rest of the world's history.

Saloon keepers are seeking new fields in the suburban districts of Boston. They plead that those who protest against their intrusion are not entitled to be heard because they are Prohibitionists. But Prohibitionists might well turn the tables by urging that the petitioners are not entitled to a hearing because they are liquor dealers. Surely that class are not benefactors to any community.

We have received from the chairman of the Board of Police Commissioners of Boston a letter expressing thanks for the publication of Dr. Quint's article, The Policeman at the Crossing. He says: "It is not only gratifying to me but it is also encouraging to the officers." We should have better government if more people expressed their appreciation of the good things of the government we have.

Prof. Henry Drummond's pupils in the Free Church, College, Glasgow, were told by one of his colleagues at the opening of the fall term that since midsummer there had been marked progress in Professor Drummond's condition, visible not only to his friends but certified to by his doctors. This will cheer the hearts of all those who admire or love Professor Drummond, and there are many such in America.

The November Review of Reviews is notable for several reasons; among others, because in one of its articles Dr. Lyman Abbott of The Outlook opposes the free coinage of silver, and in another Dr. Charles Spahr of The Outlook urges it. This recalls the famous compact between Grady and Howell of the Atlanta Constitution, which provided that one day the Constitution should reflect Grady's views, and the next day should be Howell's mouthpiece.

The sect known as the Covenanters hold that it is wrong to vote in political elections because God is not named in the Constitution. Not long ago a town in New York in which many of them live had to decide whether or not liquor should be sold there. The Covenanters went to the polls and settled it for the next two years that liquor should not be sold in that place. They wisely concluded that it was more important to vote to keep the devil out of their town than to refrain from voting because the name of God is not in the Constitution.

Captain Pratt's heart must swell with pride as the tidings come to him of the successive contests of the Carlisle team of Indians on the football field. They have met Princeton, Yale and Harvard, and, though they have not won against the teams of these three great universities, they have shown themselves worthy of the first rank as players. What is more, they have played like gentlemen. When it was pretty certain that a mistake of the umpire kept them from having a tie game with Yale, they made no complaint. All honor to the Indian football eleven and to the Carlisle Industrial School. Its young men have shown themselves quite as civilized as their white opponents.

Presbyterians in Philadelphia have just laid the corner stone of a great denominational headquarters, which is to be called The Witherspoon, in honor of the great divine and patriot, Rev. John Witherspoon. This fact suggests the query, why cannot the new headquarters we are to have on Beacon Street, Boston, have some such distinctive, specific name—one identified with our historic polity and faith? The new church in Brookline, which is formally recognized this week, has made a happy departure from precedent and selected with great unanimity the name Leyden. There are now no other Congregational churches in the country by that name, but we fancy there may be.

Mr. Moody's friends in Great Britain, led by laymen like Lord Kinnaird, Lord Overtoun and Sir George Williams, and clergymen like Grattan Guinness, F. B. Meyer, Webb-Peploe and Monro Gibson, are endeavoring to raise funds with which to aid in the erection of a chapel at Mt. Hermon. They intend to present at least £2,500 to him on his next (sixtieth) birthday, which will be used in this way. Can his many friends in this country let the same anniversary pass by without some suitable similar recognition of a career the like of which has hardly a parallel in the history of modern Christianity? Elsewhere we give considerable space to a description of Mr. Moody's work as an educator.

An esteemed correspondent takes exception to a recent editorial statement in The Congregationalist that the Supreme Court decided that the Negro in the United States "had no rights which a white man was bound to respect." Our correspondent says that the court simply declared as a fact that the Negro had not and had never had under the Constitution any rights as a citizen. It must be remembered, however, that the Negro, Dred, claimed judgment as a citizen. The court decided that he was not a citizen of Missouri, and that for that reason the court had no jurisdiction in the case. But the declarations which followed, of which that above mentioned was one, were also the opinions of the court on the question whether or not the Negro had any rights as a citizen.

Those pulpits were few and far between last Sunday where no reference was made to the all absorbing interest of the week. The text of Professor Hincks's patriotic sermon at Andover was, "We know not what shall be on the morrow." A rather unexpected turn to a discourse which had in it hardly any other allusion to politics was given in a suburban church. The pastor cited the election of the apostolic successor to Judas as recorded in the first chapter of Acts, and termed it one of the first instances of democratic government coupled with divine determination of the outcome. He then went on quietly to remark that there were two candidates for the vacant apostleship. The name of one began with B and of the other with M, and M was chosen.

Now that the campaign is over, a yet greater work for the country remains to be done. It is much to be desired that it should be undertaken independent of party politics and in a thoroughly patriotic spirit. President Tucker of Dartmouth College, in the Boston Journal, expresses a sentiment with which we heartily agree:

I count it the great value of the present campaign that it is showing the people of all sections, and of all kinds of business, how to discriminate between true and false remedies for social and economic ills. We have at least gone far enough to expose the false. It is to be hoped that, when the campaign is over, the men of both parties who have worked together in the interest of sound money will work with equal zeal and with equal purpose to remedy that popular discontent which has caused the present startling divergence from the ordinary course of American politics.

What Mr. Moody is accomplishing in his colportage work is referred to in the article elsewhere in this issue. Practical proofs of its effectiveness are all the time coming to hand. Only last July a hardened convict in a Chicago jail, who would never allow any missionary to talk with him, was willing to accept three books presented by a colporteur. The one entitled The Way to God proved to be the means of his conversion, and he lent it to three other convicts, upon whom the simple statement of gospel truth made the same impression. All four are now, although behind prison bars, some of them sentenced for a number of years, nevertheless leading true Christian lives. We have this on the authority of the officials of the prison. It surely looks as if the printed message would sometimes reach "him whom a sermon flies." Certainly this single volume, now soiled, worn and much marked, has done a work the results of which, compared with its slight cost, are simply wonderful.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

The One Topic.

Very little is talked of here except politics. The wise in such matters express themselves as positively sure that the election is to go "the right way." Many devout people are watching and praying for a religious awakening in our churches, such as has marked well remembered former times of business prostration, and to this end are looking with large expectation to the coming of Mr. Moody and his co-workers. At present, however, no great general deepening of religious impression in the city is manifest, but the warm union of believing hearts here and there in prayer for the Spirit's coming the experienced have come to look upon as a sure precursor of better things. About two hundred ministers of different evangelical denominations have pledged themselves to co-operate with Mr. Moody in his evangelistic work in New York, Brooklyn and Jersey City in November. From the 9th to the 13th inclusive he is to preach in Cooper Union.

Christian Patriotism.

No man, however strong his sense of the responsibility of the pulpit for the training of the people in civil duties, can accuse the Congregational pastors of Brooklyn of failure in this line. Last Sunday both Drs. Meredith and Behrends appealed to their congregations to stand firm and faithful to God and man in this crisis of our country's history. The honest English language could not be made to condemn more plainly or more powerfully than it was made by both these pastors to condemn the dishonor of the attempt to lower the value of our country's dollar. The hearing or reading of these burning patriotic utterances reminds the elders of the days of Sumter, of Bull Run and of Gettysburg. The Lord grant that in every vital exigency through which our country may be called to pass such potent voices may be heard in our pulpits speaking fearlessly to the people all the words of God's law.

The Manhattan Association.

This body, represented by nearly sixty of its members, met on Oct. 28 with Dr. Virgin in the lecture-rooms of the Pilgrim Church. It was the association's annual and sixtieth regular meeting. Dr. Cobb temporarily presided. Rev. W. T. McElveen, Ph. D., was chosen to succeed Dr. Kent as president for the year and Rev. F. I. Wheat of Woodhaven was re-elected secretary and treasurer. Dr. Meredith for the committee announced the program for celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of Dr. Storrs's pastorate. The association's date in the elaborate program, covering more than a week, is on Nov. 16, when it gives a dinner to the doctor—one of its founders and most active members—in connection with which it will present him a "loving cup," now being wrought by the deft hands of Tiffany's artists.

The literary exercise of the morning, running into the afternoon, was a review of Dr. George A. Gordon's Christ of Today, by Dr. Virgin. Those who know the reviewer would not expect his assent to the doctrinal positions and trend of the book, yet its literary and other excellences were pointed out with none the less candor, and the spirit of the review was tempered by warm regard for the author, well known and warmly esteemed here before making his home in Boston. This acquaintance distinctly colored the spirited description of the book and the review, in which many of the brethren took part, both pro and con, notably Drs. Behrends, Meredith, Cobb, Kincaid, Gilman, Dickerman, Stimson, Spaulding, Newton and others.

Dr. J. W. Hegeman read a thoughtful paper on The Future Christ and Dr. Kent spoke on Pastoral Problems and Plans.

The Brooklyn Congregational Club

On Monday evening began its first year's trial of life under a clerical president, Dr. Joseph B. Clark, contravening the unwritten but well-nigh universal law requiring that these clubs be presided over by laymen. The business went off with such speed and vim that the club thought the innovation was a success. The theme was, What Are These Clubs For? Hon. S. B. Capen of Boston first answered the question by saying they are not for eating and drinking together, nor simply for social conference, but for promoting the interests of our Congregational churches, especially in each club's own vicinity, and for cherishing denominational unity and loyalty. Then, having gained this power of union of many churches, the clubs should use it in promoting civic, municipal and other desirable reforms. The address was clear, forcible, practical, and met with hearty approval.

Mr. S. S. Marples, late president of the New York Club, seconded Mr. Capen's remarks with the experience of its sister across the river, and showed how effectively his recommendation could be carried out.

Mrs. William Kincaid, speaking for the women of the club, advocated setting apart evenings for discussing a variety of useful and appropriate topics, as, e. g., literary nights, when distinguished literary men may be heard on literary themes; missionary nights, when great Christian works may be presented by the brightest men and women who know the pertinent facts and how to put them before their hearers. She carried the hearty assent of the audience.

Dr. Lyman presented a graceful and tender minute with reference to the character and work of the club's first three ex-presidents, who by a singular fatality had all died since the last meeting: Mr. James Mitchell, the first; Hon. Joshua M. Van Cott, the third; and Dr. A. C. Perkins, the second who had filled the presidential chair. At the next meeting Dr. Storrs is to be the guest of the club and make an address.

The Bushwick Avenue Church, Rev. C. W. King, last week opened a free reading-room and gymnasium, with a view to drawing in young men of the neighborhood with no present religious faith or preferences, hoping thereby gradually to interest them in the things of the kingdom. The pastor and several brethren form a "board of governors" for the proper care of the enterprise. Dr. Raymond, president of Union College, preached again for the Broadway Tabernacle Church last Sabbath. Next Sunday President Patton of Princeton is to preach.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

The Working Men's Home Medical Mission.

This mission, only three years old, founded by Dr. J. H. Kellogg of the Brattle Creek Sanitarium, has been doing a quiet but excellent work in Chicago. Recently Dr. Kellogg gave an account of his work at a meeting held in Willard Hall in the interests of the needy classes of the city. Although Miss Jane Addams and Prof. C. R. Henderson addressed the meeting, interest centered in the words of Dr. Kellogg. Some three years since a gentleman quite unknown to the doctor asked him if he could use a sum of money for the worthy poor in Chicago and afterwards, with the help of his brother, placed in his hands forty thousand dollars. The brothers Wessells, from whom the gift came, had made their money in South Africa and were anxious to do something for those less fortunate than themselves. They learned through Dr. Kellogg that, in spite of the abundance of food in Chicago and its cheapness, a great many people go hungry every day and at night have nowhere to sleep. Their purpose and that of the doctor was not so much to consider the cause of this state of things, as, if possible, to relieve the suffering attending it. A place was therefore secured where men could obtain a nourishing breakfast for a penny, and where a good dinner could also be had for a penny a dish. Cheap lodgings were also provided. Before going to bed the men are compelled to take a shower bath and have their clothing fumigated. The beds are clean and comfortable. At present the doctor has beds for four hundred men. Religious services are held in connection with the exercise of benevolence and everything is done that is possible to encourage men to make a new start in life and find positions in which they can take care of themselves. Nearly all the work in this house of refuge is voluntary, although its managers and directors receive a small salary. At Forty-Seventh Street the doctor has a social settlement where there are baths, a dispensary for women and children, a home for visiting nurses and free kitchen and kindergartens. There is also a home for women at 247 Polk Street.

It has been found that few men are unwilling to work. Work has therefore been furnished, so that for a time those who are needy are able to earn their support, and from this home as a refuge look around for such better positions as they are capable of filling. Afternoon Bible studies, lectures on health and against the use of alcohol have proved attractive as well as instructive. At the gospel meeting in the evening 200 men are frequently present. The doctor has several farms in Michigan at his disposal. To these he sends those who are willing to go and, by means of vegetable gardening and the raising of fruit, contribute to their own support. Recently a farm in La Salle County, Ill., has come into his possession. In three years not less than 100,000 bath tickets have been used. This means that 100,000 men have slept in the clean beds which this charity has provided, and have had time to think over their condition and form plans for a better life than they have been leading.

Another New Edifice in Prospect.

The Jefferson Congregational Church, Rev. A. M. Thome, pastor, one of the oldest in the association, laid the corner stone of a new house of worship Oct. 27. It has long worshiped in an unattractive frame house, but has gone steadily forward in its work. Its pastor, although past seventy, shows no sign of abating strength and has lost none of his youthful vigor. The new house will cost about $7,000 and will easily seat 500 people. Superintendent Armstrong made the principal address.

The Co-operating Committee of the Interior.

In the conviction that the present year will prove one of the hardest in the history of the American Board, the committee has early set itself to work to increase the interest felt in missions in the churches of the Interior and is planning to do everything in its power to reach the non contributing churches, as well as to increase the gifts which have been received from those contributing. The committee will aid Secretary Hitchcock in every possible way to spread information in regard to the needs and possibilities of the foreign fields.

The Church of the Redeemer.

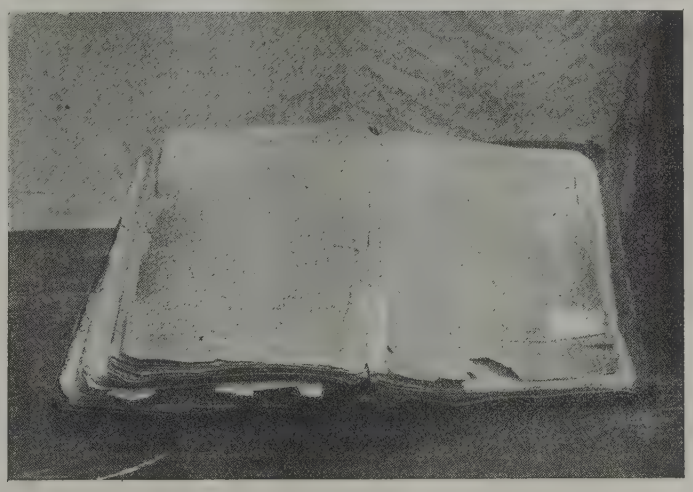
Few churches of our name have anywhere enjoyed a more prosperous year than the Church of the Redeemer. More than ninety persons have been added to its membership during this period. The actual strength of the society has been more than doubled. The Sunday school has increased in numbers, the prayer meetings have never been so interesting or so earnest. In fact, it never was more evident than at present that this church has a promising future. The pastor, Rev. W. H. Manss, fresh from his studies, coming from the Lutheran Church, has thrown himself into his work with his whole soul, and has endeared himself not only to his congregation, but to all who have in any way been associated with him. Much to the delight of his church he has now taken to himself a wife. His marriage with Miss Jennie Allen took place, Oct. 28, in Polo, Ill. Mr. Manss has been absent from his pulpit but a single Sunday, and, in order that the work might not suffer, has taken only a brief vacation during the year.

FRANKLIN.

Educational Northfield.

The Various Institutions and Agencies With Which Mr. Moody Is Associated.

At the opening of Camp Northfield last summer Mr. Moody spoke of the occasion as "the christening of the ninth baby of the Northfield movement." It is a lusty family, of which any father might well be proud, with not one ailing or feeble child in all the circle, and among its members there is a beautiful life of mutual helpfulness which proves the spiritual health of all. The eldest is the Northfield Seminary. Then follow in order of age the Mt. Hermon School for boys, one of the phases of whose industrial life is indicated by an illustration, the General Conference for Christian Workers, the World's Student Conference, the Chicago Bible Institute, the Northfield Training School, the Woman's College Conference, the Colportage Association and the ninth and latest baby, the Northfield Y. M. C. A. Encampment, whose first tabernacles a second picture shows.



MR. MOODY'S BIBLE.

It is hardly necessary to say that such a group of successful educational enterprises, following swiftly one upon another, must have not merely a strong man, but a dominant and enduring purpose behind them. Mr. Moody may not be in the common (and only accidentally correct) meaning of the word an educated man, but he has studied the world and knows men as well as books, and it is significant that as builder of educational foundations he has returned to the eminently practical aims of the founders of all our New England colleges. Knowledge as an accomplishment appeals to him not at all, but for the sake of imparting knowledge to those who will use it as an instrument of helpful service he has been willing to undertake great enterprises in simple faith and to carry heavy financial burdens year by year.

It is this normal element—this teaching of those who will be teachers—which is the most interesting and significant feature of the whole group of enterprises which we have characterized as Mr. Moody's children. "The seed is the word of God," might well be the motto for them all. Their founder is himself a devout and persevering student of the Scriptures. His well-thumbed Bible is the familiar companion of all his meetings, conferences and journeys. He has worn out several copies, reducing them at last by constant handling to the state shown in our illustration, and it is to a like close and effective study of the English text that he invites his students. In passing on this gift to others he evidently expects them to bring forth fruit a hundred fold. It costs $200 to support a boy or girl in one of the Northfield schools, while only $100 is received in payment of tuition. Naturally, therefore, the authorities are not anxious unduly to increase the number of students, but rather to select from the many applicants those who seem likely to develop into strong and helpful characters.

Of attendants at the Bible Conference the great majority are preachers or Bible class teachers. The training school is avowedly intended for the practical equipment of Christian workers. It is said that there are good scholars in Bible classes taught by the 570 students in attendance on the Northfield students' conference this summer. In addition to this normal training of individuals, the Northfield idea has been widely transplanted and taken root in many soils. Other conferences suggested by and modeled after that held at Northfield have been established in the West, in England, Germany, Denmark, Switzerland, Scandinavia, Japan, Ceylon, Persia, Turkey and India.

Already widely successful and eminently characteristic is the eighth child of the Northfield movement, the Colportage Association, whose superintendent is Mr. A. P. Fitt of 250 La Salle Avenue, Chicago. It began, as all the other enterprises have begun, in devising a method of meeting a practical need. Means of earning money were in demand among the students of the Chicago Training School. Some of them had tried successfully the experiment of book peddling. Their need and the dearth of religious books in the smaller towns worked together to suggest the outlines of the plan. About this time also Mr. Moody was startled one day by the statement that there were 750,000 prisoners in the jails of the country, and, although it proved that this was the estimated number of the criminal classes rather than of actual prisoners, it none the less opened to Mr. Moody's thought an opportunity of service which must in the necessity of the case be through literature rather than personal influence.

THE GOSPEL WAGON.

How real the destitution of fresh religious books had come to be no one can understand who has not himself looked over the stock of the booksellers in the smaller towns of the West. The cheap book trade has either passed from their hands or consists for the most part of paper covered stories. Mr. Moody himself failed to find a single religious book on sale in a town of 15,000 inhabitants.

Cheapness, readableness and a high religious tone were the ends desired. The books are ordered in editions of 20,000, well printed on good paper and neatly bound in dark red paper, and are sold at fifteen cents apiece, or two for a quarter. By taking advantage of cheap manufacture in these immense editions, and by the gift of the copyright from such authors as Mr. Moody himself, Dr. Meyer, Dr. Chapman and others, these rates have been made possible, including a living profit for an active agent. Even the problem of approach and introduction has been solved in a characteristic way. The books are inclosed in a stout manilla envelope, which is left at the house with the statement that the agent will call in a few days. There is no necessity for impertinent urgency, and when seller and purchaser meet it is the purchaser's own fault if he does not stand on equal terms of knowledge with the seller as to the qualities of the book. Not least of the advantages of this method in the eyes of the founder of the agency is that it opens the way for conversation upon spiritual things between the agent and the people, and in this regard he has had good reason to be satisfied with its effects both in awakening interest and giving the agents a practical training in hand to hand Christian work.

If any one doubts the existence of a market for such wares the experience of the first year, ending March, 1896, in the course of which over 400,000 volumes were sold, may resolve the doubt. One of the latest forms of effort has been the sending out of a gospel wagon, arranged in the fashion of a miniature sleeping car, with kitchen attachment, which many of our readers may remember to have seen at the Chicago World's Fair. It made last summer a tour of Illinois and part of Iowa, under care of five students of the Chicago Institute. Pastors were notified beforehand of its coming. The mornings were spent in distributing and selling books, afternoon services were held for children and evening services for adults. The effort took on an evangelistic color from the first, and the students in charge report that the results were astonishing, both in their own growth and in apparent helpfulness to others. With the return of cold weather the wagon is to be sent on a trip through the South.

The books comprising this colportage library, a number of which have been sent to us for review, are by Spurgeon, Moody, Meyer, Chapman, Whittle and others, and the literary as well as spiritual average has been kept high. The books are not denominational but they are all intensely evangelical and written by men in close touch with the people. By personal effort and the gifts of friends over 129,000 books have been circulated in the prisons and among the criminal classes and the sale from house to house grows ever greater. It is a large work, whose further growth we shall watch with great interest, and its method and purpose should be studied closely by any one who wishes to understand the secret of Northfield educational work. A PRAYER FOR THE TIMES.

Hon. Philip James Bailey, so well known to readers of a former generation as the author of Festus, is still a careful reader of American papers and deeply interested in current events. We give below an extract from that remarkable book, Festus, which is as appropriate today as when penned by him over fifty years ago. It is especially suited to these days of political strife.

The bells of time are ringing changes fast.
Grant, Lord, that each fresh peal may usher in An era of advancement; that each change
Prove an effectual, lasting, happy gain.
And we beseech thee overrule, O God,
All civil contests to the good of all,
All party and religious differences
To beneficial ends, whether secured
Or lost; and let all strife, political
Or social, spring from conscientious aims.
And have a generous, self-ennobling end,
Man's good and thine own glory in view always.
The best may then fail and the worst succeed
Alike with honor.

SAN FRANCISCO'S NEW LEADER.

BY REV. JOHN L. SEWALL.

In making a church a minister usually makes himself. Such is the case with Rev. Dr. George C. Adams, who has closed a fifteen years' pastorate with the Compton Hill Congregational Church in St. Louis, and turned his steps toward the Golden Gate, loaded with the appreciative gratitude and love of the church which he organized and has guided from the beginning, and of all the churches and ministers of that city. In May, 1881, at the invitation of Dr. Goodell, he visited St. Louis to consider undertaking a mission enterprise three blocks from the present location of the Union Station. He was at that time thirty-one years old, in the early vigor of manhood. A son of Maine, an alumnus of Amherst, a graduate of Yale Divinity School, trained by the experience of two successful pastorates in Hillsboro and Alton, Ill., and hungry for hard work, he was precisely the kind of man that Dr. Goodell and a needy field were seeking.

For thirteen years the Presbyterians had been trying to build a church on the spot, and had dismally failed. The neighborhood was largely destitute of religious people of any kind. The building was old and forbidding. The only earthly possibility of planting a Congregational church there was the fact that Constans L. Goodell believed that it ought to be done, and stood ready with his great-souled cheer and substantial aid. He said to the young Illinois pastor as they stood together in the abandoned structure, "Here is your field; the people are all about you; God calls you to this parish; there are people now on the way from every State in this Union and from across the seas to join your church."

That prophecy was seed sown on good soil. Mr. Adams responded to the opportunity and to the call. Dr. Goodell guaranteed the expenses of the church for three years, paying one-third of the sum from his own pocket. In two years and a half the Fifth Congregational Church had come to self-support and was making itself a power in that section of the city. Soon, however, owing to a change in the character of residents in the vicinity, it became evident that only a mission church with mission methods could be there sustained, and the undaunted pastor, with the loyal following of his people and the ever ready aid of Pilgrim Church, had the grand audacity to move two miles to the southwest, buy a choice lot on Compton Heights, where they had already planted a Sunday school, and move into a chapel basement, temporarily roofed, just before winter came on. The timeliness and courage of the movement alone saved it from failure. Today there stands on that corner a fine stone edifice, occupied by a church membership of nearly 450, with an assured future before it.

In spite of the fact that the drift of American population has been disheartteningly away from the region for the last ten years and its place supplied by beer loving Germans, Dr. Adams has toiled with unwearying patience and has received over 1,000 persons into membership, all but a small percentage from families not hitherto Congregationalists. Meanwhile Dr. Adams, who received his degree from Illinois College of which he is a trustee, has covered a much larger area with his genial and helpful influence. The mantle of Goodell fell upon his shoulders, and although the size and situation of his church has kept him from being the nominal leader of St. Louis Congregationalism, no man has carried the interests of the work more closely to his heart or given larger gifts of wisdom to mutual undertakings in the city and in the State. He has thus become an expert in the work of Congregational church extension in cities.

As a pastor Dr. Adams is wonderfully sympathetic and tactful, rarely suffering one of his homes to be invaded by death without afterward reaping spiritual harvests from sorrow-softened souls. As a man of business he is possessed with a shrewd Yankee sense and grit, which makes him afraid of no undertaking, and ever ready to put his own strength under every load. He is not perpetually inventing new machinery as a substitute for aroused individualism, and he has no patience with schemes for the wholesale reorganization of the social structure, though keenly alive to every vital issue of the hour.

As a preacher Dr. Adams has never yet had the opportunity for quiet study which develops one's best powers, and there is little doubt that his new field will call forth greater homiletic work than he has yet done; but whoever today listens to him is struck by his simplicity, directness, command of illustration and insight into the daily lives of his people. He is a magnificent type of faith in Congregational principles, and has the spiritual, intellectual and physical robustness to exemplify them. His new field, the First Church, San Francisco, has certainly stood in the public thought during the last few months as possessing many discouraging features, for which no one could properly be suggested who was not rich in patience, discretion and faith. In entering this field he has shown by his power to unite every one in a hopeful forward look the promise of being the man of divine Providence for one of the most important churches of our order.

PILGRIMAGE PERSPECTIVES.

BY REV. SHERROD SOULÉ, NAUGATUCK, CT.

The charge of the twoscore and six Congregationalists is completed. Then they came back, but not—not the forty-six. We went out en masse. We returned by installments. In early June the Pilgrim persuasion in this land of "stars and stripes" delegated us to traverse the main and Gaze upon the land of our ancestry ecclesiastical and lineal.

"We came unto the land whither thou sentest us." There is no minority report. The land is fair and fat. If wood is wanting brick is abundant. There are cities both walled and dyked. "The people be strong that dwell in the land," and if they have Anaks in ability so have we, just as big and as brave. The land is goodly, flowing with tea and tarts. The fruits of centuries of Christian civilization we found in abundance, and each has brought back a heavy cluster to share with friends.

We cannot say with Caleb, "Let us go up at once and possess the land," for, forsooth, we are already possessed by it. We plead guilty to an unconditional un-Miles Standish surrender. England and America are one and inseparable in the divine destiny; their language is common; they think the same high thoughts and cherish the same noble aspirations. Christianity controls both continents. Cables connect under the vast deep; and on its bosom the swift ships, like shuttles, are weaving the web of commerce which both nations are to wear. Both should have the same morals, the same manners and the same money. England in her heart has no hate for her offspring; and America cannot discard her heredity, for she cannot 'run away from her backbone."

English Congregationalists of course most heartily received us into their haunts and homes, their churches and pulpits. Reluctantly but royally the parting guests were speeded. But how about the enemy ecclesiastical, the persecutors of our Pilgrim parents? History did not repeat itself. The Anglican Church has repented and it is not yet the eleventh hour. True, the "old leaven" may not be wholly "purged out," but even our patron saint Calvin had to admit that the Christian, though supplied with "special grace" and with a will "wholly inclined toward holiness" still possessed "remnants of indwelling sin." Certainly the Episcopalians treated us after the apostolic injunction, for when we were hungry they fed us, and when we thirsted they gave us drink, and glowing embers which accrued upon our heads were fanned into an undying flame of admiration and affection by unsparing effort and kindly attention.

We have nearly lost sight of our text. Perspectives depend upon position. Vistas vary according to the viewer. Accounts through the secular press have given hints of Pilgrimage happenings. The interesting and instructive weekly letters of "F. J. D." leave little to be added as regards places and persons, experiences and lessons. The composite impression has been developed. The delicacy of touch and beauty of shading will be missed in these Pilgrimage perspectives, for here the point of view is masculine and ministerial, but the contrast may be suggestive. If these observations seem a trifle tardy, remember that Bancroft asserted that history can only be fairly and fully written until fifty years after it happened.

Every hour since our return the vision of the visit has grown more glorious. The rose tinge in the memory has changed from "mermet" to "jacqueminot." The only criticism we can construct is the total lack of discomfort, disagreeableness and disappointment sufficient to serve as contrasts.

The chief charm was the company. We were a goodly people, even if we are conscious of it. Christian came before Congregational. We realized our responsibilities as representatives. "Blood will tell," and we tried "to do credit to our bringing up." True to the traditions of our polity the party was not solely male or female, young or old, clerical or lay. The majesty of membership in a Congregational church was maintained. Equality of personal privilege was preserved. Suffrage was not limited to size or sex. Individualism was cherished, while fellowship was emphasized. The merchant and minister met in "elbow touch." The physician and pedagogue secured a symmetry of body and mind. All the ladies were "elect" whether married or maiden. How unsatisfactory and un-Congregational if the party had been all men or all ministers. Could we have spared the two members with the sweet unconscious graces of girlhood, the enthusiasm of youth and the charm of perfect manners? Verily not.

We were a company of plain persons, without gaudy apparel, glitter of gold and flash of gems, but whenever we faced bishops, met a mayor, confronted a canon, or strayed into the haunts of royalty we turned with commendable pride to the two fine types of young Christian American girlhood and said within ourselves, "There are our jewels." What a "goodly fellowship of the saints" has been realized. A week on a steamer is worth a year's residence in the same neighborhood and a month of travel more than a lifetime receiving and returning calls. Which one of us can ever sing in sincerity the hymn, "I'm a pilgrim and I'm a stranger?" The latter rôle is obsolete. Even England ruled out this hymn, for as soon as our feet touched the shores of Devon we were all "changed in the twinkling of an eye" from strangers to brethren beloved.

There is a freemasonry of Christian hearts which forestalls features and names, defies distance and transcends nationality. Still the palm comes not without toil, and if you are a Pilgrim you must bear the penalty. You must preach and you must eat. You must act and appear so as not to disappoint those who place you on the lofty pedestal of imagination. The "prophet is not without honor" proverb is still in force. Once we were noted and found a people who appreciated us. We rose to the occasion. Our spokesman, equipped by travel, the pulpit and editor's chair, "did us proud" and, like the immortal poet of the nation we visited, did not repeat himself. The one who carried the name and the blood and the office of the famous Leyden pastor inherited no sinecure. Perhaps he may be pardoned if in the heat and burden of the day he lapsed into pious profanity, and exclaimed, "Shade of my ancestor."

Politically the Pilgrimage party was representative of the New World. Not all of the talk was of theology or travel. Protection had its advocates. Independents of necessity were there. Silver had its supporter—not a ranting, long-whiskered, tangle-haired type, but an intelligent, informed, quiet, lovable, conscientious Christian Congregationalist, and the Pilgrims "were not able to ignore the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake," but he did not suffer stoning. Prohibitionists paid a visit to the Lady Somerset shrine.

"What shall I more say? for time would fail me." The plates in the Pilgrim kodak are used. The pictures are in the solution of memory. There are no negatives, all is positive. The pictures will be printed indelibly on both mind and heart.

ANNIVERSARY GUESTS AND HOSTS.

BY ONE OF A COMMITTEE ON ENTERTAINMENT.

Boston has of late entertained several national religious assemblies. Notable among them were the International Sunday School Convention and the Jubilee Meeting of the A. M. A. The committees who looked after the entertainment of guests learned several things new and interesting. They did not find the readiness of former years among Christian families to open their doors. Still they discovered a goodly number willing to share their homes with strangers, not because they expected to draw a prize in the lottery of hospitality and get an angel unawares, but because they were interested in the work which these assemblies were doing. They assumed that the guests they received were their friends, and honored them with those choice gifts which make such entertainment valuable beyond what any hotels or boarding houses can offer. They received, too, more than they gave. There is more interest in this vicinity in Sunday schools and in Christian work among the Southern Negroes and Western Indians than there was before these conventions came. It is an interest which public gatherings could not have created without the social adjunct. It is illustrated by a letter just received concerning an American Board meeting in another city. The writer says: "Mr. —— and his family have been enthusiastic supporters of foreign missions ever since the annual meeting here a few years ago, when they entertained several guests. The presence of these friends of missions in their home converted them. Before that they neither knew nor cared much about the subject." In that way many a devoted friend of the American Board has been made.

Others there were who used hospitality, but they did it grudgingly. Their pastors had made them feel that the honor of their church required that its quota of hosts should be filled without a draft and, as they could not get substitutes, they enlisted—with wry faces. Some agreed to provide for one or more guests, sent them to hotels and paid their bills, vowing never to assume any such responsibility again. Some expressed the opinion that the better way would be to furnish a printed list of expected delegates and allow families to invite such as they should select, leaving the remainder to be provided for at hotels or to take care of themselves.

It has proved quite as difficult for committees to satisfy guests as to please hosts. One or two examples will suffice as illustrations. A delegate to the Sunday School Convention asked to be moved to some other place. "What is the trouble?" we said. "Isn't it a nice place?" "O, yes, a very nice place. But they are the kind of people who have prayers every morning, and it takes so much time convention week."

One man was assigned to a suburban home. He went and looked at the house, came back and put up at a hotel. Just before the close of the meeting he remarked to the chairman of the committee, "I didn't use your assignment card. I've no doubt they were nice people, but it's too far out." The chairman said, "Did you know that those people sat up till eleven o'clock two nights waiting for your arrival?" "Why no, I never thought of that."

An interesting article might be made of what came after the conventions. The committee do not know how many guests failed to recognize the hospitality they received by letters of acknowledgment after their return home, but they have heard of a number of such cases. Sometimes, however, the hosts had more than they expected. One gentleman, on leaving, was asked to come again sometime. One day soon after an entire family appeared without notice, but with a letter from the former guest saying that as he could not avail himself of the invitation to return, he had sent these friends of his in his place. They stayed a week.

The committees have on file some remarkable letters from guests dissatisfied with the committee's arrangements. One man, a week after the convention, wrote, "Did you receive a telegram from me, asking an assignment?" Nothing from him was found in the files. The committee replied, "Had we received your telegram we must have replied that no assignment could be made until you arrived." Promptly there came a red-hot letter denouncing the old fogy methods of the committee.

From interviews with several committees I am convinced that few of them would be willing again to serve in the same capacity in the same cities. But they could furnish material for a very valuable little hand-book of suggestions for both hosts and guests at religious conventions.

In an Illinois neighborhood during the present year about seventy-five per cent. of the population have suffered from typhoid fever, and all these persons were attendants on a particular church. If Cotton Mather had known of such a church, he would have found the devil in it and would have exorcised him by fasting and prayer. In this case, however, it has now been discovered that the worshipers had been drinking from a tainted well which stood near the church edifice. A good many diseases nowadays are healed by science, for which our fathers knew no remedy except prayer and fasting. But the power to heal is not less the gift of God because we know better how to use it; while still greater gifts yet wait to be bestowed in answer to the earnest, believing prayer joined with faithful study and effort.

What May the Community Expect from a New Church?*

By Rev. Henry A. Stimson, D. D.

"And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance; for ye serve the Lord Christ."—Col. 3: 23, 24.

From the standpoint of earth there may be more important events in the life of the city than the organizing of a new church, but from the standpoint of heaven this may be doubted. It marks a distinct advance in the kingdom of Christ. It serves notice to the community of progress and conquest; it is the recognition by a body of believers of the call to assume new and grave responsibilities, and it is the opportunity for definite and permanent advance in personal faith and service on the part of individual believers. It is the addition of another member to the body of Christ, and it is the erection of another altar where the sorrowing shall be comforted, the sick ministered unto, the weary refreshed, the weak strengthened, the wandering regained and the perishing saved. It is one more established place for the utterance of the oracles of God and for proclaiming to men the claims and the love of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We do not hesitate to take to ourselves the strong words of the apostle. We are going to do heartily or, as the Greek is, "from the soul" what the Lord has given us to do. "As to the Lord, and not unto men," though we hope for the good will and approval of our brethren. And we have peace, as we look into our hearts, in believing that "the reward of the Christian's inheritance," which the Lord himself shall give, will not be withheld. We, too, serve the Lord Christ. But we are keenly aware that he is not the dead, and not simply the present, but the living Christ. And life is always movement. The tree lives because the sap has begun to flow; the child lives, it cries, it stirs. The universe is alive, not dead, because every least molecule is tense with vibrating energy; throbbing life is everywhere. Existence itself is a stream. It cannot be stationary. There is no present. The present is only a point between the past that is gone and the future that is coming on.

Yet Jesus Christ is "the same, yesterday and today and forever." So is nature in all that is essential. One plan, one law, one sure advance, one entity in which there is no waste. So is man—the same always as man, changing ever. Yes, but never in this changed. The endless change only emphasizes the identity. Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar. What does that mean, except that civilization does much, but the man remains?

So with the church. The universal law applies—life by living. But with the church there is a strange tendency to fixedness. Stability without flow is made the desideratum. Change is dreaded. Men's faces get to be backward. Antiquity is worshiped. Creeds and ritual crystallize, and in the crystal force, however tense, is set. Service becomes perfunctory. Ruts are honored and tradition takes the place of life. Then comes an outbreak, for the Lord is in his church. He lives whether his church is alive or not.

So there are great reformations when the evil has become worldwide, and the birth of new denominations when some special truth has been atrophied or suppressed, and the organization of new local churches when there is local need. Not that with us there is need of protest. Not that there is thoughtless breaking of established ties and old associations. Not that there is disregard of other bodies of believers, still less wanton rivalry. Not that there is mere restlessness and desire for change. On the contrary, here you will find the measure of personal sacrifice. As the proverb runs: "Any fool can chop down a tree; it takes a wise man to make one grow."

The associations of a lifetime cannot be made in a minute. Affection cannot be transferred with a "by your leave." It means much to leave one's church home, with all the sweet memories of the past, or to be pulled up and transplanted. As the years gather upon us such experiences come hard. They cut into the soul. But we "serve the Lord Christ." We ask only, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" We shall say nothing of sacrifice or of trial or of cost. We pray only that we may have the joy of being accepted and that while life lasts we may live.

So much for our individual action, and for the past. Now what may we properly be expected to do as we proceed to call into being a new church? A new church may in the first place be properly expected to do something in the way of restating the old faith in the terms of modern thought and life. We hold "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." It is the old wine. We cannot better it. But the bottle must continually be renewed, for the wine may take up too much of the old wineskin, and the two must be carefully kept distinct. We cannot believe simply because others have believed. Voters are no longer content with the party ticket, they demand the right to challenge the names upon it. Can we do less as Christians? Here is the historic creed. What does it say? Let me translate it into terms of today. Let me test it and test myself by the grip its several statements have upon my heart and life.

We have no desire to add another to the world's great confessions, or even to revise the declarations of the fathers. They are so many great nuggets found in the thin vein of gold-bearing quartz that has been forced in devious way, faulted here and depleted there, through the solid rock of often unprofitable centuries by the hot fires of persecution and the mighty throes of nations and races contending for the faith.

Well for us if we can see as clearly, and think as profoundly, and believe as stoutly, and contend as manfully as did they. But we, as they, must live our faith to hold it, and to live it we must know it, and to know it we must think it out for ourselves. Now, where do we stand? Let us sit down and inquire. Do we distinguish between the essential and the non-essential? Are we ready to make a saving faith a sufficient faith, stripping from it whatever is a mere denominational tenet or an individual interpretation? And do we hold this saving faith—this faith that constitutes the heart of every Christion confession and is professed by every body of believers—do we know this and hold this for ourselves?

Unconsciously, perhaps, by force of habit long undisturbed, by carelessness, or minds preoccupied with other things, have we become uncertain of the truth or unsteady in its application, less fearful of offending God, less eager for his immediate and constant approval; then God's sovereignty is fading, however orthodox may be our confession. So with our sense of sin, and the doctrine of the atonement; or our growing worldliness and self-sufficiency, and the doctrine of the Spirit; or our neglect of Christian service, and the doctrine of brotherhood and of the church. Do we read the Bible less and pray less? Are we less concerned for the souls of men? Then the old faith for us is waning. As we make a new confession there is occasion for searching of heart, that the lips may not gainsay the life. Humbly we confess our faith, such as it is, and with an earnest prayer for an ever growing light we make our covenant with God and with one another.

In the second place, a new church may properly be expected to do something in adjusting its methods to the present needs of the community. As the years advance churches and men lose touch with the world. We gather about us our set. Public opinion is for us the opinion of our kind. We have unconsciously cantoned off a little world in which we live content. We set up our own standards; we measure others and we want to be measured ourselves by our own conventions. We lose our grasp of the great truths as we fall out of the greater relations of life. We come to set high value upon riches and social standing and personal culture, and less upon spirituality and even upon character. Wealth and social position and culture are God's good gifts and, in the main, substantial evidence of successful achievement in the work of life. They are a measure of hard work and good judgment and much self-control and wise foresight. They represent tremendous power of good or evil. The temptation is to make them ends in themselves or to hold them apart, forgetting the responsibility of service and that because we have more than others more shall be required. We do not mean to do it, and next to the classes that possess these things we of the church suffer most by the misjudgment.

But there is ground for the grievance of the wage-workers. How few of them we see in our churches. It is true they have churches for themselves in some sections, true that in the aggregate of church membership throughout the land there are many of them, but the working people have come not to feel at home in our churches. Pews and pew rents have something to do with it. Social distinctions count for much. Worldliness plays its evil part. Be the reason what it may, the result is plain. But many do not see how much the rich suffer from it. No evil is greater today, none fuller of danger for the future of the city, than the extent to which the wealthier classes are allowing themselves to lose interest in the churches and in what we may call responsible religion. The cares of the world and the corrosion of luxury and the pride of life are crowding them into a narrow world by themselves, in which the soul withers. What would it not mean for the future of this city if a revival from God should be vouchsafed to our rich men and their households? I mean those of them who are today in the condition I have described.

There is then no one class which alone is in need. We all need the Spirit of God. We all need the church, we all need interest in our fellowmen, we all need the refining and mellowing influence of Christian service, constant and responsible, lest we fall away and fall below our better, truer selves.

Now the church is to help us to this. Our hour of morning worship is for this. As we seek in the freshest moments of the Lord's Day to fill the wells of our soul in sweet communion with him here we have true fellowship with one another. We take each other by the hand, we throw off the thoughts and cares of the week as we put off our week day clothes, that on this common ground, as children in their Father's house, we may find new life. Later in the day we give ourselves to service of others. We have the Sunday school, with its Bible classes for old and young, and the second service. To it we shall strive to bring our unconverted friends, that we with them may learn to know the personal Christ. Out of such a Sabbath shall flow a busy and helpfull week, with its varied duties.

> For a Sabbath well spent
> Brings a week of content
> And strength for the toils of tomorrow;

Until on Friday evening we come together again to consecrate all to God and gain preparation for another Sabbath. Our worship from first to last shall thus find its outcome and its test in service and in growth, and we shall be workers together with God.

Once more. We may properly be expected to show something of closer unity with other Christians and other churches. This has been the glory of Congregationalism. It has given of its best to all, until in its impoverishment, as here in New York, it has almost lost its place and its name. But this glory cannot be taken from it. It has sought not its own, but Christ's; and now if, in seeking Christ's in a still larger and wiser way, it begins to do its proper work and seek to contribute its own peculiar share to the common Christianity, as in the prismatic colors each contributes its part to the undivided sunlight, it will diminish nothing of its breadth and loving fellowship. We shall seek to build up, and not to pull down. We are recruits coming to take our place in orderly array side by side with those who are already engaged in the battle of the Lord. I rejoice greatly that we are so understood, and that some of the most loving expressions that have come to me for myself and for you are from pastors of the neighboring churches. We shall not be looked upon askance, and our endeavor shall be not to be ministered unto, but to minister.

But, above all, in organizing our new church, we shall be expected to strive for and to show a steadier and a more intense personal devotion to the Lord Jesus Christ. It all must gather itself up into this: more love, more prayer, more unselfishness, more sweetness of character. In short, piety as a personal appropriation of Jesus. Who will question the enterprise, who will talk of the cost or of the difficulties, if this is what the people about us see? Are we then quietly and surely opening the doors for the soul? Are we in the way of gaining the ineffable vision of those who see God? Are we making a home here and in our hearts for him through whom we shall have access to the throne of grace? Are we taking on new power for service and reviving powers long unused, emotions long unfelt? Are we preparing for ourselves the joy of new victory—victory over sloth and self-indulgence and coldness and a waning faith? Do we begin to feel a new love for the souls of men and a new brotherhood in one another? Have we not then already proved our right to be, and begun already to receive our overflowing measure of reward?

IAN MACLAREN'S MOVEMENTS.

Reports are reaching us of Dr. Watson's successes as preacher and lecturer in Western States. In Chicago, in addition to the several lectures, he favored the university with an address. Dr. Gunsaulus escorted him through Armour Institute, and on one evening he was the guest of the Twentieth Century Club.

The First Congregational Church at Appleton was fortunate enough to secure Dr. Watson for a sermon Sunday morning, Oct. 25, when many came from adjoining towns, one wagon load arriving from a place fifty miles distant, and over twenty towns and cities being represented in the congregation. This was one of the five preaching appointments which Dr. Watson originally made for this country. It will be remembered that the Sunday Evening Club idea originated with Rev. John Faville, the pastor of the First Church, Appleton, and Dr. Watson's interest in this movement was one reason why he consented to preach for Mr. Faville.

From Appleton Dr. Watson went to Madison, where he was the guest of President Adams, and thence to St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Des Moines, Io., his furthest point West. This week he is working his way East, stopping at Oberlin, Cleveland, Pittsburg and Niagara Falls. On Sunday, Nov. 8, he preaches in Philadelphia, on the 22d in Jersey City, and on the 29th in Boston at the Old South Church. He will lecture in Boston Nov. 24, and on Thanksgiving Day is to be the guest of Mrs. James T. Field.

Significant Events and Conditions.

Progressive Roman Catholics.

In view of the activity of the Roman Catholics everywhere apparent in Germany, the discussions and resolutions of the annual gathering at Dortmund, the forty-third in its history, are of great importance. This gathering includes laymen as well as ecclesiastics, and the former are quite as prominent in it as priests or bishops. Much satisfaction was expressed over the rapid growth of missionary work in South Africa and in all the newer German colonies. Several members of the Reichstag took part in the discussions. Dr. Lieber, leader of the Center in the Reichstag, deplored the continued imprisonment of the pope in the Vatican, and expressed the hope that his temporal power would soon be restored, not only on the ground of right and justice, but as a means of protection for every throne in Europe. This papal throne he affirmed to be the oldest in Europe, and said that as the keeper of men's consciences its occupant should be protected on it by every ruler in Europe.

The resolutions adopted are in the main full of the spirit of progress, indicate a thorough knowledge of existing social conditions and read very much like resolutions adopted by a body of Protestant Christians. Here and there, however, the character of the body which passed them appears. Demands are made that the law against the Jesuits be repealed, that the church be given more authority in the common schools, that special Catholic universities be established, where the sons of Catholics may be educated without imbibing the spirit of Protestantism, that the church be permitted to decide upon the legality or illegality of marriage and divorce and that special effort be put forth by the Catholic members of the Reichstag to secure more favorable legislation. Yet no one can deny that through this annual gathering the Catholics of Germany have from year to year put themselves on record as friends of the wage-earners, as advocates of arbitration between capital and labor, as in sympathy with every movement which promises to improve social conditions, as ready to use all the power of the church to defend the integrity of the empire, and at the same time secure contentment and happiness in its subjects. The assembly passed a resolution of sympathy with the Armenians.

The Drift of Discussion.

As evidence of the interest of the German brethren in what are burning questions with us may be mentioned the fact that at the meeting of the missionary committee of the Society for Saxony one of the themes on which a paper was read was Secularization, One of the Dangers of Our Times. Certain other questions are pressing in Germany which do not trouble us. For example, the Lutheran Conference of the province of Brandenberg, the province in which Berlin is situated, felt itself compelled to protest against the present tendency of appointing men to theological chairs who do not accept fully the standards of the church. It was affirmed that it is difficult for theological students to obtain really evangelical instruction in the universities. It was therefore voted to ask the authorities of the church to ask the authorities of the state to appoint gifted, thoroughly trained theological instructors to the theological faculties, and when vacancies in professorships occur to fill them with evangelical men. This question is likely to become more and more important. The uncertainty which exists in many minds as to the attitude which a minister may take in regard to political questions is as anxiously discussed in Germany as it sometimes is in the United States. A paper on the subject, and full discussion, led to the following conclusions: The minister's chief duty is to lead sinners to repentance. But sinners live in this world and have relations to it which cannot be avoided. These relations call for laws which even ministers must recognize.

An Aggressive Move.

An evangelizing society has been formed in Schleswig-Holstein, from which the best results are expected. Its aim is to provide helpers for faithful and over-worked pastors, in addition to the aid they are now in many cases receiving through deacons and deaconesses. In certain sections of the country no religious services are held. Services are also called for which shall attract those unaccustomed to attend church and adapted to the needs of Sunday school children. In short, for such work as is done by city missionaries and missionaries who have been employed now and then in the country there is a pressing demand. Volunteers are to be carefully trained in the society's institution at Breklum, and will, it is expected, remain permanently in close relations to the leader of the institution, although in their work they will put themselves under the direction of pastors, and strive in every possible way to strengthen the hold of the church on the minds of the community. In some respects this new movement reminds one of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute at Chicago, or of the short course in some of our theological seminaries. The Germans, however, do not undertake to fit men for the ministry, but only as lay workers who are to supply a lack which religious forces at present employed do not and cannot meet.

Protestantism in France.

The condition of Protestantism in France, though hopeful, is not altogether what one could wish. The death of such friends as Jules Simon and Leon Say is a severe blow to the cause. Both men were interested in securing a better observance of the Sabbath, in withstanding the inroads of skepticism, and in protecting the people against the moral ruin which indifference to vital religion always carries in its train. It is said that unbelief among the educated classes is, to some extent, giving place to belief. Even the minister of foreign affairs, who has opposed clericalism as a political party, declares that in doing this neither he nor his associates are giving up faith in God or in religion, that both, in fact, have their roots in conscience.

French Protestants are vying with Catholics in collecting money for the Armenians, in securing outings and homes for poor children, and in furthering what may be called the Christian social movement. Complaint is made that the Revue de deux Mondes has become ultramontane in its Catholicism, and that many influential papers are openly expressing their hatred for Jews and Germans, as well as for Protestants, whether English or French. For all the misfortunes in Madagascar Protestantism is held responsible. Efforts are constantly put forth to bring the liberal and evangelical branches of the Protestant Church together, if not in doctrine at least in such an organization as will secure from the government recognition of its rights. Meanwhile, the evangelical section of the church is steadily increasing in numbers and power and is proving itself a worthy representative of the Huguenots.

Consistent Action.

Dr. Eugene Schmitt until recently was an office holder in the Hungarian Department of Justice. Coming to hold Count Tolstoi's views that all government by force is inconsistent with Christian love, he began to proclaim his opinion in a magazine edited by himself. Requested to desist, he has resigned his office, refusing longer, as he puts it, to serve "under an institution which represents the legal oppression and exploitation of mankind."

AN ARMENIAN MARTYR.

BY MRS. MERRILL E. GATES.

High up on the dead-cart fling him!
Gash his breast in the shape of the cross!
That is only his wife who is kneeling
'Mid the piles of the mangled you toss!

Away to the graveyard cart him—
The man with the cruciform mark!
Or deep in the Bosporus drop him,
Thrust him anywhere—into the dark.

'Tis only a husband and father,
'Tis only a Christian who dies
By the sword of the Moslem driven
Through his quivering heart where he lies!

But lo, the sword leaves an emblem
Cut into his flesh to the bone;
'Tis the sign of the Master of Sorrows,
'Tis the cross of the Crucified One!

Though sunk under treacherous waters,
Though buried, half-dead, at your word,
Think you that form can be hidden
From the searchlight swift of the Lord?

Blood red, in the name of the prophet,
Score the cross with relentless hands!
But know 'tis a token for vengeance,
A symbol that God understands!

Commenting upon the act of Mrs. Lathrop, Nathaniel Hawthorne's daughter, whereby she has chosen a life of service among the poor who are afflicted with cancer, the Christian Herald says that her "life till now has been one of refinement." Her husband, also, in explaining their separation, speaks of her as having "turned from a life of refinement and culture to one of ministration to the suffering, the destitute and the incurable." These comments raise the query, Does a life of refinement cease when one leaves luxury or comfort to live simply? Does the life of refinement necessarily end when one ceases to think or to create literature and begins to feel and to restore physical health? We trow not. Refinement or culture are not interchangeable terms with comfort or intellectual growth, and those err grievously who try to make the public think that they are synonymous.

Among the death notices in a New York paper not long ago we noticed one of "Bridget, faithful and valued servant for twenty years in the household of" a certain prominent family. Still more recently we observed among the bequests of a wealthy New Englander that generous provision had been made for the household servants. Both these instances point to a practical appreciation of domestic service which is all too rare. In earlier times, when servants were considered an integral part of household life, it was nothing uncommon for them to be remembered in the will of master or mistress, and in case of death to have a fitting burial from the home to whose comfort they had ministered. Modern conditions, it is true, have greatly shortened tenures of office in the kitchen and thereby weakened the personal interest which might otherwise be felt. But, making due allowance for this change, there is a good deal of genuinely devoted service which receives no reward in the forms mentioned.

Have you noticed the motto on the button which your boy is wearing? For it is assumed that he has fallen prey to the sudden frenzy which has broken out like an epidemic all over the land for adorning his manly breast with these innocent looking disks. If the sentiment inscribed thereon is patriotic all right. Let us stimulate love of country in all legitimate ways. But many of the mottoes on the buttons and badges are so coarse and vulgar as to be positively immoral in their influence. The craze has been so demoralizing in certain sections that the school authorities have prohibited pupils from wearing the buttons in school hours. This very restriction, however, only excites the boys to flaunt them more conspicuously at other times, and in their eagerness to collect a large number they pay little heed to the character of the words. Consequently a perfect flood of trashy and impure sentiment is deluging our American youth. The fad may be only short lived, but it is well enough for parents to examine these adornings on their boys' jackets.

WILL YOU BE ONE?

A wise, practicable and truly Christian suggestion was made by Mrs. Goodell, president of the Woman's Home Missionary Association, at its annual meeting last week in respect to Christmas giving. It will be noticed that she advocates the plan for one year only, and we would like to be an agent for speeding on the good work by letting it be known through this department of the paper if Christian women are really willing to respond to the suggestion. Several have already signified their willingness. The proposition is this:

At the risk of being criticised for meddling with time honored customs, I would suggest that, for once at least, we break away from our habit of exchanging Christmas presents with our nearer friends and relatives and place the amount we should otherwise spend for this purpose, more or less, in the Lord's treasury.

This at first may shock your sense of propriety and you may say it can't be done. But let us look at the matter candidly for a moment and see if some light does not break in. We will suppose a typical case. Here is a lady blessed with a family of her own—a husband and three or four children perhaps. Not far away are the families of her beloved parents and of her brothers and sisters, forming a group of uncles and aunts and cousins and nieces and nephews almost without number, the more the better when they come to the Christmas gathering or tree. In addition to these of kin she has a circle of choice and intimate friends—friends, it may be, of the years—who have always been included in her Christmas benefactions, and who, in turn, favor her in like manner. All of these dear ones must be "remembered" with some gift adapted in style and value to the age and supposed taste and predilection of each.

As the time approaches she carefully makes out her list, and plans for one after another separately, spending days of thought over the matter. Then come the selection and purchase, and finally the arranging of the numerous parcels securely for the mails or other conveyance. In all this she finds infinite delight, of course. Her own heart is kindled and other hearts respond through the medium of these material gifts, and Christmas joys are multiplied in many homes. Granting this to be true, and the custom well worth perpetuating to a wholesome extent, yet I long to show unto you a more excellent way. Let me repeat my suggestion. It is this—that for once we break away from our habit of exchanging Christmas presents with our nearer friends and relatives, and place the amount we should otherwise spend for this purpose in the Lord's treasury.

This suggestion will, of course, allow of all proper limitations, such as would affect those about us in need or destitution, or who are in any measure dependent upon us for cheer or help. Narrowing the circle down as much as we may wish, there will still be left ample opportunity for carrying out this plan.

If our typical lady adopts it, think what it will mean in her own case, just in dollars and cents, saying nothing of the real joy of her sacrifice for Christ's sake—for we will grant it did cost her a bit of a struggle! Then, if others follow her lead by the tens and hundreds, who can compute the sum thus diverted from a lower to a higher end, or the astonishing figures that will tell the story of the wonderful increase to our missionary treasury in this year of pressure? Why, there is not one of us but would be so happy and proud (I use this word in a sanctified sense) over the result that we should wonder we had never attempted it before!

This plan, if carried out, I hear you say, will necessitate some adjusting in its details. Yes, we shall want to enlist as many of our friends as possible beforehand, acquaint them with our project and get them to join us in it, so that their gifts to us may be withheld for the same reason that ours will be withheld from them. We can easily arrange a mutual understanding with them, whereby we shall agree simply to send each other a brief, personal, written word of greeting at Christmastime, expressive of our love and good wishes, and which shall this year take the place of the customary Christmas present.

A TASTE FOR READING.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

It is by no means to be taken for granted that a taste for reading invariably comes by nature. Nobody can observe children without seeing that while some of them take to books, to use a familiar simile, as a duck takes to water, others are indifferent to the printed page, and prefer other amusements or occupations to the quieter pleasure of reading.

When a child really loves to read and needs no urging to sit down with a book, the mother has of course the responsibility of guiding his reading. The truly book-loving child may be led to form a taste for the best and purest by judicious care and sympathetic comradeship on the part of mothers and teachers. But read he must and will, and time will never be a burden on his hands. Unless his mental palate is early enfeebled or vitiated by indulgence in a style of reading which is morally bad, or which is simply entertaining without any ultimate end of instruction or discipline, such a child will find delight in books of travel and in histories of his own and other countries and periods. He will not be limited to stories which are merely imaginative, though imaginative literature should always form a portion of his intellectual fare. Such a child, born with the love of books, is to be congratulated. He is armed for the battles of life as none can be who do not know the stimulus, the rest, the refreshment and the profound help and encouragement which comes to a human soul through the vital thought and living heart throb of good books.

An instance occurs to me by way of illustration. Lord Macaulay had been defeated in a political contest, and while the shouts of the victors were ringing in his ears he sat down to write an ode to literature, which remained his exceeding comfort. If there were time such instances might easily be multiplied, but one on the opposite side is all which I can mention here. Of a lady in deep grief a friend not long ago said to me, "If only she cared for reading it would be easier to divert her, but she has never accustomed herself to find pleasure in books, and they bore her."

The mother whose task it must be to form in her children a taste for reading may inquire, by what means shall I set about this work? How shall I beguile my active boy from his games, or my daughter from her playmates, in order to interest them in books? I would advise such an one to begin a course of reading aloud to her little ones in the late afternoon, before supper, for example, or in the hour just after the evening meal, choosing a pleasant story, reading a prescribed time and breaking off at an interesting point. If this is done regularly the habit of anticipation will soon be established. With the older young people I would try to have reading aloud by turns in the evening whenever the family can be assembled. Let the conversation at the table turn on the books read. This is almost traditional as a New England custom, if one may judge both from observation and from much study of New England's literature of biography. The love of reading leads by easy steps to intelligent discussion, and I know more than one household in which an adjournment of the family as a committee of the whole to consult an encyclopedia or a lexicon is a not uncommon performance after the leisurely evening meal.

In addition to reading with children, it is well to let them by degrees collect little libraries of their own. Give a book as a reward, and respect its owner's right of possession. Insist on certain quiet intervals from play, when the pursuits followed must be either the reading of a paper or magazine, the writing letters to one another, the drawing of pictures or the pasting of clippings and illustrations in a scrap-book. While the utmost freedom for romping and for even violent exercise must be given at times, yet there is a time for everything, and the formation of reposeful habits is as important as any other thing in the training of children.

Always have an acquaintance with the books your children read. Great and often irreparable harm is done to immature minds by bad literature. There are boys in reformatories and prisons today who would not be there but for the agency of evil books. We cannot be too careful in this regard, for when a child is influenced for evil by the Satanic agency of an impure or wicked book his moral life is poisoned at the source. Far better might the physical life receive injury than the moral nature suffer distortion in this way.

The heart of Christ in the heart of the Christian is the vital center of practical Christianity, the living fountain of all its healing agencies.—James W. Campbell.

LARGER HOSPITALITY.

BY HARRIETTE KNIGHT SMITH.

The old-time conception of a home as a man's fortress, into which he could withdraw himself from the world, is no longer the ideal of home life. To make such use of our dwellings as he would have us who had "not where to lay his head," while he was securing for selfish humanity mansions in glory, is the larger and Christlike idea of our duty one to the other. Who ever read of the home at Bethany, where Mary, Martha and Lazarus habitually welcomed the homeless Jesus and ministered lovingly to him, without a prayer of thanksgiving that at least in one earth-home he was always an honored guest? An established, not an occasional, hospitality was the principle of this Bethany home, and what must this sacred relation of love and sympathy have meant to him who in his loneliness exclaimed, "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head."

Organized hospitality is the outgrowth of Christianity, and while we glory in such work as our city missionary societies, homes and asylums, fresh air benevolences and floating hospitals are doing to brighten the lives of those less fortunate than ourselves, we must not allow them to take from us the privilege of using our individual homes in a personal manner. Two modern instances of the large and loving use of Christian homes it is a joy to record. A merchant of extensive business relations, who reserves time for doing many of the Lord's larger or smaller errands with his consecrated wife, is accustomed to invite groups of young working women to dinner companies at his own home (not some public hall), and to devote entire evenings to them in the discussion of grave matters of current history in municipal or national affairs. A gentleman who could hold almost any position of public trust in Massachusetts receiving these lonely, homesick young girls into his home, and treating them with as much consideration as he could bestow upon his only daughter, is a lovely picture of nineteenth century Christlikeness.

The other method of hospitality is most significant in its twofold relation to guest and hostess, and illustrates a noble way of rising above mere selfish grief by doing the Lord's will. Father and mother had passed into the rest that remaineth for the children of God, and left an only daughter in a large and most homelike house. With an intense longing to remain in the dwelling so dear to her, she began to wonder how to readjust her life "without selfishly keeping the dear home all to herself." Providentially a physician told her of a lady who would be greatly benefited if some one in the suburbs could invite her away from the heat and noise of the business section for a two weeks' rest, a change which would involve no long journey by rail. An invitation was immediately extended, and in the two years since then this lady has received as guests home and foreign missionaries, Salvation Army and other Christian workers, trained nurses and young business women, besides adopting a little German orphan in whom her mother was much interested.

"It is simply making such use of their home as would gratify my parents," she recently said to me, adding, "Adjectives are misplaced in its mention, since the people who need me are those I most need."

There was no closing of doors from a morbid, selfish grief, and the home is all the dearer since making it a haven of rest to guests of the character described.

"YE NEXTE THINGE."

BY FRANCES C. SPARHAWK.

"She must be exactly my size and hight, and then I can give her my gowns," said Nora White.

"And she must be able to get her foot into a three and a half, and then I'll give her as many boots and shoes as she can wear, for I don't like them after the newness is off, and I don't know what to do with them," said Kate Bland.

"If her head is small enough to wear my hats, she's welcome to them second-hand," announced Sally Peters, with a laugh.

"In that case she wouldn't have brains enough to make it worth our while to take her up," whispered Nell Marden to her next neighbor, who nodded and giggled in response.

"I can give her a winter sacque," asserted Hortense Hartley. "And if she can wear number five gloves, she's welcome to some of my old ones."

"I can give her plenty of underwear; I want to lay in a new stock anyhow," said Mary Wilson. She was nearly a head shorter than Nora White, who was to furnish the gowns.

The leader of this band of King's Daughters, a girl scarcely older than themselves, looked from one to another of these six wealthy girls who had just designated their contributions. Then her eyes sought the floor in silence.

"I don't know what we can do in this way," she said at last. "I'll talk it over with Mrs. Dole and let you know next week. It doesn't look promising to me."

"O, you'll make it all right, Lilian," cried Mary. "That's what you're leader for, you know, to bring us out ahead. We've told you what we'll do. Now, you hunt up this girl for us."

"Yes, Lilian, find us a girl to order, do; wouldn't that be fun!" And Nora White clapped her hands in anticipation.

"And such a charity to get rid of our old duds!" cried Hortense, with a laugh, in which they all joined except the leader, who had risen and stood with her back to the others, pretending to be looking out of the window and trying to swallow her tears before they should be seen; for they would be only another cause of mirth to these six girls whom she had undertaken to lead.

The tears came readily enough, however, as that evening she poured forth her troubles into the sympathetic ear of Mrs. Dole, who was her own leader in another circle and who had persuaded her to form this "Hopeful Circle," and to bring into it some of the girls of her acquaintance who ought to be in the work and who had made inquiries concerning it which might, with proper fostering, lead to something. "They haven't the first instincts of King's Daughters," sobbed the girl; "they don't even know what it means to give, they only pitch away what they don't want. As to sacrifice, even the heathen knew more about it! And how am I to find a girl to order? And what kind of a person would she be if I did?"

"I think I can help you out there," answered the other. "I do know an ambitious girl about the size of Nora White; we'll measure her and see." And she laughed a little. "She would do anything for an education. As to the other thing, Lilian, there is one of the parables that is always of the greatest comfort to me, the one that speaks of the kingdom of heaven as a grain of mustard seed. It's so small at first, you see, that we may overlook it; we may think it hasn't fallen into the ground at all, but been swept away by the winds. But I don't think it belongs to us to judge of this. Let us try, and see how it will turn out. Don't you remember that beautiful poem you brought me one day last month, Doe Ye Nexte Thinge? Let's do it now. I'll get the girl; you go straight on, and see how things come out."

"O, I will!" cried Lilian, a happy light in her eyes.

Three months later a girl of sixteen, with dark hazel eyes that delighted by their beauty and gave assurance of power and of fidelity, a nose proclaiming strength of will and fineness of intellectual taste, and a mouth of great strength and sweetness—a girl tall and lithe but too thin for beauty—stood washing dishes in the kitchen of a lady who was most kindly allowing her to earn her board while at school and profiting by her skill to the extent of getting quite as much work out of her as from any second girl to whom she had ever paid full wages. "Now I have finished, now I am free," Rachel would think again and again. But it never happened so. But for her nights, and that she roomed by herself, she would have had no chance at all to lead her class as she was doing. Lilian knew all this but was powerless to help. Her own father had died, she had lost her money, her mother as well as she herself depended upon what she could earn. As it was the little pocket money that found its way to Rachel came from her.

Nine months more went by. And then the end that Lilian had long expected came. The "Hopeful Circle" had an exciting meeting with their protégé, as they called her, lying ill in one of the free beds of the hospital. By twos and threes the whole circle had visited her and the pathos of her colorless face wrung their young hearts in spite of vigorous efforts in more than one instance to banish the haunting vision. Lilian was a few minutes late and found the girls in full tide of talk.

"And now, just when she would have taken the first prize," Nora White was saying, "here she is, floored, won't be good for anything for three months at least."

"And not in that time," the doctor says, "unless she can have the best of care," put in Nell Marden. "I can send her some jellies and such things," she added.

A chorus of assent greeted the proposition. They could all do this.

"But what the doctor means," Kate Bland said, "is that she would get well fast if she were a rich girl, you know. Of course we can't help that. Isn't it always the way things happen?" she went on. "Nobody could be more satisfactory than Rachel, or reflect more credit on what we have done for her."

"What have you done for her?" asked their leader, dryly.

"Done!" cried an indignant chorus. "Why, isn't she our girl? Haven't we done everything for her? Isn't she in school on account of us?"

And there fell a silence in which six pair of flashing eyes and six stern faces were bent upon Lilian. With an inward prayer that she might fight her battle well, Lilian struck out from the shoulder.

"How has she been your girl?" she asked, her own eyes flashing by turns into her listeners. "Did you find her? Did you comfort her with your presence? Did one of you ever go to see her? Did you plan one day of vacation for her in all these months? She has had a few, unknown to you, though. Did you give her your friendship? Did you even take the trouble to see her at all until her school rank under such difficulties won your admiration? In all this year which of you, as a daughter of the King, has said to her one word or sent to her one message as to another daughter of the same King? If I had asked for her admittance into your circle as one of yourselves, you know you would have refused her as not being in your set. I saved her pride the possible knowledge of such a repulse. You gave her what you did not want yourselves. But in all this year, that has brought to her struggle and suffering of which we can have no idea, which one of you all has denied herself the smallest luxury, even to the price of a concert ticket, to make this poor girl's hardships ever so little less? And now, with her splendid record—now"—

She choked, her eyes brimmed with tears. She struggled to control herself. There fell a long silence.

"My father says," began Nora White at last, "that all this talk about 'classes' is the driest rot. I move we invite Rachel Groton to join our circle of King's Daughters."

"Second the motion," said Hortense Hartley.

It was carried unanimously.

"And I move further," Nora went on, "that, having adopted her as a sister, we treat her like one. She needs six months of luxury to get really strong. My father gives me a big allowance for two months every summer. She shall have it. He'll advance it to me, I'm sure."

"And I'll help—and I—and I," came the voices, until all had pledged themselves to do something.

Lilian listened in a wonder that flushed her cheeks and deepened the light in her lovely eyes. It was done. Why, it was done!

"And you dear little brick, gold brick!" cried Nell Marden to her, "you must be the one to tell her that the old days have gone, that she is one of us, and that she must get well and make us more proud of her than ever."

"I move a vote of thanks to Lilian for showing us our duty," said Hortense Hartley.

"No, no!" cried the girl. But this only made the vote the heartier.

"My father says," declared Nora, "that nowadays all you need is to get there. And I've found out now it's being a King's Daughter to help everybody else to get there, too."

When one is in good health, says the Journal of Hygiene, the mouth needs no special care beyond that of ordinary cleanliness because the secretions of the various glands in it act as disinfectants. But in illness these secretions need to be stimulated and a simple method is to chew some splinters of fresh pine wood. An excellent wash for the mouth is lukewarm water containing a little common salt, tincture of myrrh or cologne.

Closet and Altar

Begin each day by tarrying before God and letting him touch you. Take time to meet God.

One great characteristic of holiness is never to be exacting, never to complain. Each complaint drags us down a degree in our upward course. If you would discern in whom God's spirit dwells watch that person and notice whether you ever hear him murmur.—Gold Dust.

God keeps us through the common days;
The level stretches white with dust,
When thought is tired and hands upraise
Their burdens feebly, since they must.
In days of slowly fretting care,
Then most we need the strength of prayer.

—Mrs. Sangster.

Whatever shame it may cost you to think of your past I beseech you to realize that it is possible for you to live henceforth a life of holiness and of power, and to glorify God before all the world in your spirit and your body, which are his. It is possible just in proportion as we have been with Jesus, not only in the sense of following Christ as imitators of his earthly life, simply admiring the man for his self-sacrifice and for the beauty of his character and conduct, but, deeper far than all that, we must be with Jesus in the actual realities of his death, his burial, his resurrection and his ascension to the throne of God, the Father.—Webb-Peploe.

Hast thou, my Master, aught for me to do
To honor thee today?
Hast thou a word of love to some poor soul
That I may say?
For see this world that thou hast made so fair
Within its heart is sad;
Thousands are lonely, thousands weep and and sigh,
But few are glad.

—Mrs. Prentiss.

Where the peace is which Christ gives all the trouble and disquiet of the world cannot disturb it. All outward distress to such a mind is but as the rattling of the hail upon the tiles to him that sits within the house at a sumptuous banquet.—Leighton.

O Lord, our God and Father, increase our longing for thee. May we realize that we have none in heaven but thee, and may we desire none upon earth besides thee. So deepen our sense of our need of thee that we may feel that the best gift thou hast in store for us is the gift of thyself; and meet thou our longing with such an assurance of thy presence that we shall be glad and rejoice in thee. Give us the power to see thy hand in all that comes to us. Impress upon us more and more the truth that every good gift and every perfect gift is from above and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. Now, as our grateful and fervent thoughts turn to thee, may we set ourselves anew to give thee our loving service. Quicken our consciences, stir our aspirations, sanctify and strengthen our wills, so that we may continually show, in word and deed, that we are followers of thy Son, our Lord and Master, in whose name alone we ask these and all other blessings, with the forgiveness of all our sins. Amen.

95. TRANSPOSITION.

I've built me many a stately hall
From airy fabric of romance;
But think the fairest one of all
My Spanish castles is in France.

The ONE bright waters wash its wall;
The sunbeams shine through painted TWO,
Where flame-winged THREE may swing and call,
Mid flowers that bloom the whole year through.

Upon the polished inlaid floors—
Deft FOUR must rub them while I doze—
No FIVES, or such official bores,
May ever set intruding toes.

Soft music thrills the throbbing air,
Where fountains plash in misty grace,
Till mid such splendors, I declare,
I feel myself quite out of place. M. C. S.

96. SWINGING 'ROUND THE CIRCLE.

We started, some from Gotham, and some from the City of Churches, in the Empire State; and went first to the City of Elms in the Land of Steady Habits, which some call the Wooden Nutmeg State. We then spent a day at the Hub and another at the City of Spindles in the Old Bay State. After passing through the Granite State and the Green Mountain State we went to the Forest City in the Pine Tree State. Afterwards we went through the Old Dominion, where we were shown the birthplaces of the Father of His Country, the Father of the Constitution, Tippecanoe and Old Zach. We also traveled through the Garden State, and saw the Clam-catchers at home. They assured us that the Knickerbockers could not wholly claim the Man of Destiny, as in fact he was born in their State. Next we took the Keystone State, stopping at the City of Brotherly Love and then at the Twin Cities. Among the Buckeyes we saw the birthplaces of Unconditional Surrender and the Martyr President; and stayed a short time at the Queen City, called by some Porkopolis. After that we found that the Turpentine State and the Butternuts of the Volunteer State both laid a sort of claim to Old Hickory, and the Corn Crackers of the Blue Grass State showed us where the Rail Splitter was born.

I cannot attempt to give you the order of our journey accurately, but in the course of it we visited the Wolverines, stopping at the City of the Straits, which we found a delightful place. We saw the Badgers among their own forests and the Jayhawkers in the Garden of the West. We visited the Lone Star State, the Palmetto State, and the Old Line State, stopping while in the latter at the Monumental City. We did not neglect to study the Negro Problem in the Cotton State, nor matters of interest in the Golden State and the Silver State, and made the acquaintance of the Fly-up-the-Creeks in the Peninsula State. We went to the Crescent City in the Creole State, studied the Suckers in the Prairie State and their neighbors, the Hoosiers and the Pikes, the latter found in the Iron State. We went through the Bayou State, where the Tadpoles live, saw the Beaver State and the North Star State, the latter of which is inhabited by Gophers. We did not pass by the Hawkeyes, and while in the Empire State of the South stopped at the Gate City, where we saw how the Buzzards or, as some call them, the Crackers, can manage an Exposition.

And after all our travels we landed at last where so many have sought to who swung 'round the circle before us—at the City of Magnificent Distances. DOROTHEA.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN HOMES CONTRASTED.

Price Collier says the first thing one notices on entering an Englishman's house is how well it is adapted to him; but on entering an American's house the first thing one notices is how well he adapts himself to his house. In England the establishment is carried on with a prime view to the comfort of the man; in America with the prime view to the comfort of the woman. He tells us the Englishman makes more use of home and less use of what is apart from home. An Englishman talks of home; an American of business. One is always planning to get home and enjoy home; the other to get to his store or office or other place of business. In England the last thing a man willingly lets go is the appurtenances that permit him to have his friends with him at table. He would prefer a smaller house with his servants rather than a big house and social economy; but an American will, if possible, stick to his big house. Home is not our central thought, only a place in which to stay.

And what follows? Why, as we really have no homes, we have little or no home life. We breed children, and immediately begin to farm them out to the public. For education, we farm them to the schools; for religion, to the churches; for business, to the trades and store life. Men live in business and for business. They go to their houses barely to eat and sleep. There are no such strangers as fathers and sons. The original family life is no longer lived in America. Home is a shelter, while our real living is done elsewhere.—Lend a Hand.

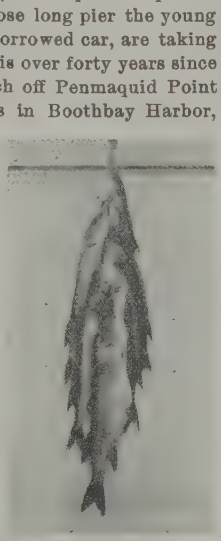
The Conversation Corner.

ABOUT these days you will be inquiring why those amateur photographs, asked for in the Corner two or three months ago, do not make their appearance. D. F. has not told me yet which of those sent in response to his offer he prefers—I suppose he is waiting until we print the others so as to come in with "one better"! So here is the one adjudged by the publisher to be the best of those coming within the range of "vacation scenes." There is a mild mystery veiling this picture. The young artist who took it conceals his identity from me, as of necessity he does his face from the photograph. The trio of happy girls in the hand-car I know only by their first names, and I think they would prefer to have those omitted. Of artist and subjects we can say, as the speaker of the House of Burgesses said of Washington, that their modesty is equal to their valor —substituting for the last noun still more appropriate words.

But the photograph is properly contributed to the Corner and is gratefully accepted—even if we do not know to whom the publisher should send the "Corner Scrapbook," or whatever else he promised for the best production of the vacation camera. The scene is on the coast of Maine, although I believe that the unseen artist and two-thirds of his passengers are from the State of Roger Williams. I have in addition a strong impression that summer visitors, taking the little steamers from Bath down the river, would pass the picturesque island, on whose long pier the young guests, with their borrowed car, are taking a morning ride. It is over forty years since I stood anchor watch off Penmaquid Point or ate green apples in Boothbay Harbor, where our mackerel schooner ran in for the night, but I know that whole region is one of beautiful scenery and as well of historic interest. If I knew the address of the Maine member of the trio, I would ask her if there is not an old fort of the War of 1812 on the island, and if the famous contest between the U. S. brig Enterprise and His Britannic Majesty's brig Boxer was not fought within sight of it? The following letter, about another Maine vacation scene, was received today. It seems so timely that I print it at once.



Dear Mr. Martin: I haven't seen any real fish stories in the Corner for a long time, although you have told lots of other kinds. This one is real because I took a picture of it which tells the whole story. Those fish in the picture are all pickerel, and we tacked up a cloth on the wall to take the picture. I caught the big one. It weighed just two pounds and three eighths. My brother helped catch the rest, and really helped catch this one too, because he rowed the boat when I pulled in the big fellow. Our eyes were big when we saw him and I guess his were when he saw us. When my brother was so glad that I caught the biggest fish, I wished he had too. [Does Harry mean two?—MR. M.] We use a spoon hook. A bright piece of tin was the bait. We caught these in our lake in Union, Me., in our vacation last summer.

Yours for Union and truth, HARRY S.

As Harry seems to rely upon the photograph to substantiate the truth of his fish story, I have asked to have it appear in this issue, only providing that the fish are not to be enlarged in the picture as they are so apt to be in narration! This town of Union is not more than three or four hours by bicycle—that is, if they have good roads down there—from the sea-girt isle of the other picture. All I know about Union is that it was so named (in 1786) because the early settlers (from Massachusetts) lived in such loving harmony and that the first minister was named True. These facts may account, by the law of heredity, for Harry's remarkable desire to be kind to his brother in catching the fish and true to the public in telling about them. I judge from his letter that he and his brother own the lake in Union; if that is true we may all feel free to try our hand (and tin) for pickerel there next summer, should we be in that region.

One story is good till another story is told—especially about fish. It was a curious coincidence that, just as I took the above letter from the post office this morning, a gentleman, who is himself a good deal of a fisherman on the coast of Maine, told me of a big halibut recently caught at the Isles of Shoals. As those islands are partly in Maine, this fish was, of course, a summer visitor, too, in that State. His length was 7½ feet, his width 3 feet and his weight 356 pounds! I did not catch the halibut, but Mr. I. did—going to the "Shoals" from a famous academic town in New Hampshire. (Since writing the above, I met at the door of Faneuil Hall, as I was going into a patriotic meeting there, the gentleman who told me the halibut story, and he showed me a photograph of the captured monster, with the captor standing beside it. That assures the truth of the story, and I hope D. F. will find a place for the photograph even if he has to omit the Corner Scrapbook. I think he will, for—to tell you a little secret—D. F. is himself a proud native of Maine, as well as an enthusiastic sportsman and bicyclist. By the way, he told me today of a curious adventure he had this morning on his wheel, I think in Franklin Park. While riding very rapidly he felt a slight tremble in his machine and looked down to see what was the matter. There was a dear little kitten right under his front wheel! He looked again, and she was running off at "scorching" speed. I cannot but hope that if she had not thus fled he would have got off his wheel and seen if she was badly hurt. If any Cornerers in that vicinity had a kitten come home with broken back or legs about that time, they will know where to apply for damages.)

Speaking about fish; the hint in the Corner Scrap book of Sept. 17 about aquariums was not in vain. A New Hampshire lady wrote to obtain the whole article about building an aquarium. A New York lady sent a card to suggest

> . . . an album containing only stamps with designs of animals, birds and fishes. It would be quite unique and entertaining. If Sarah Noah had one she could call it Sarah Noah's Ark. I think of starting one myself; it ought to consist of the finny tribe and be called The Aquarium! MISS F.

I leave you to guess this correspondent's full surname. A caller told me a few days ago of visiting another island resort on the coast of Maine a short sail from the isle of the young ladies' railroad, where the different residents placed over their cottages some emblem to answer for a doorplate, as, for instance, a gentleman by the name of Gunn displayed a rifle, and one named Cutler hoisted a cutlass!

Here comes another Maine vacation letter:

PATTEN, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: I spent the first week of my vacation at my uncle's on a farm. I saw two deer. They were red and very pretty. They were playing like calves. The next week I spent at Shin Pond camping out with papa and mamma. I had a nice time sailing my yacht, which is a fine model of the "Defender." I spent the third week on the East Branch of the Penobscot. While there I saw three more deer, a buck, a doe and a fawn.

PHIL H.

While I have been copying this letter another Maine boy calls and tells an interesting story of his camping out at the foot of White Cap Mountain, in that same region, and his interview with a young moose, etc. What a "Maine landslide" we have this week, like that of the second Monday in September—I will stop short before any more members from the Pine Tree State write or call with their big fish or moose stories!

N. B. Letters sent to Clinton, Ct., Charlottesville, Va., and Pacific Grove, Cal., have come back to me through the post office, "unclaimed." Probably those places were only vacation residences. I have received several interesting anonymous letters, which cannot, of course, be answered or used. Be sure and give your full name and permanent address.

LESSON FOR NOV. 15. 1 Kings 9: 1-9.

GOD'S BLESSING UPON SOLOMON.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

There is more than one important crisis in every man's career. One's destiny is not finally decided by a right choice in youth. It must be made again and again as new conditions appear. "Call no man happy till he dies" is a sentence which would not be out of place in the book of Proverbs. The two appearances of the Lord to Solomon serve to emphasize the necessity of repeated choices of holiness, and so used they make a very effective lesson. This second appearance as contrasted with the first points to:

I. Solomon's period of success. The date of this appearance was evidently about the time his palace was completed, which was thirteen years after the dedication of the temple. Thus far he had led:

1. A religious life. Up to this point the record tells us of his constant devotion to God. The reasons for it are plain. He had found work to do for God and he had engaged in it with all his heart. Temple building, organizing the people for worship and leading them in it had absorbed his attention. He had looked back to that night in Gibeon both as a call to special service and as a promise of reward for it. He had responded to the call and had experienced the reward as the years of service went by.

Life is religious in proportion as one does business for God. To have a vision of him and to begin to hear his counsel with an obedient spirit, that is, to be converted, is the real beginning of life. But, however vivid that experience may be, it will amount to little unless it is followed by daily communion with God in private, and by work distinctively done for him. A man may persuade himself that all his labor is consecrated to God. But if he allows its necessities to keep him away from public worship and the prayer meeting, and to excuse him from studying or teaching in the Sunday school, or any definite efforts to promote spirituality among his neighbors, he will not live a religious life. That inexorable fact must be considered in a young man's choices. The whole life may be consecrated by devoting a particular part of it to specific religious duties. But the whole life will be secularized if it be divorced from such duties. It was a splendid thing for Solomon that one of his earliest works and his greatest was to build the temple. The Christian who values his religion will never, in his business plans, leave out provision for church work and public worship.

2. A prosperous life. Solomon had built a splendid temple and a magnificent palace. He had extended the organization of his kingdom, and his commerce reached to distant nations. He had done all he had planned to do [v. 1]. Prosperity is relative. Not every one expects to do all that Solomon did. To maintain one's integrity, to win influence because of it and to be useful to others according to one's ability is to have a prosperous life. That is within the range of all men's power, and it is gained by those who seek it, even when disappointments are many.

II. Solomon's choice for the future. As at Gibeon in his youth, so now he was called to decide his policy and principle of living when his plans had been accomplished. This suggests to us:

1. The new choices of mature life. Perhaps no temptations are stronger or opportunities greater than those which come to men who have won success and done what as youth they had set out to do. What would Solomon do with the temple and the palace he had built and the power he had gained? To help him decide that question God appeared to him and renewed and enlarged his promise if Solomon would keep his statutes and judgments. [Compare ch. 3: 14 with 9: 4, 5.] But at Gibeon God uttered no warning. He seems to have accepted Solomon's petition for wisdom as an assurance that the young man's face was set toward righteousness. Now God holds up before him the terrible ruin which would follow if he should choose wrongly. The mature man was in greater peril than the boy had been. Why?

2. The dangers of God's chosen ones. It was easier for Solomon to obey God while he was gaining power than when he was using the power he had gained. Many men in middle life settle down on their past experiences and spiritually wither while they are seeking selfishly to enjoy the prosperity they have secured, instead of using their experience and acquirements to build up the kingdom of God. A father once counseled his boy very earnestly to go to church, be faithful to his covenant vows and live an active Christian life. "But," said the boy, "you don't do these things as much as you used to do." The father replied, "I don't need to. I have got established." The next day they both were drawing stone with a mule and drag. The mule balked with his load, and nothing they could do availed to start him. At last, with patience worn out, the father said, "I don't see what has got into that beast." The boy answered thoughtfully, "He seems to feel as you do. He thinks he doesn't need to go any more. He's got established." When one has made spiritual advances, and after many years finds himself stuck by the way in the midst of his possessions, he is quite likely to persuade himself that his spiritual indifference is the fixedness of faith.

Whatever may be true in the doctrine of election, it offers no comfort to the Christian who gives himself up to selfish pleasure. Solomon knew God. He had had clear assurance of the divine favor. His knowledge of God had increased through years of service to him and enjoyment of his presence. But after that experience and with that knowledge he failed. What God said he would do he did [compare vs. 6-9 with 2 Kings 17: 23; 25: 9-11]. The roots of this great disaster were already in Solomon's character [ch. 11: 9, 10]. It is not only possible for a man who has known God to lose that knowledge, but it is far harder for such a one to recover what he has lost than it was at first to become a son of God through faith in him [Heb. 6: 4-6].

III. The consequences of Solomon's choice. We shall soon be called upon to consider these more at length. But our lesson would be incomplete if we did not note as part of it these facts:

1. The destruction of the nation which Solomon had inherited and built up. He destroyed, as far as he could, all the good work of his father, as well as his own. He brought on himself personal dishonor, and on his people unmeasured misery.

2. Blessing to the world. Israel's experience became a warning which has brought many to obey God. The captivity and scattering of the nation was a means of spreading the true religion throughout the world. All is not lost when a nation is lost. Good men's lives cannot be destroyed by the deeds of their evil fellowmen. In degenerate times wise men cling to righteousness and never lose heart. God will not permit that they shall have lived in vain.

There are dogmatists and dogmatists. If, as some one has put it, "dogmatic convictions are transfigured by the glow of mystical experience," the individual asserting them has far more likelihood of winning you to agreement with him.

ROOF OR RUIN.

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's December Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

A suggestive little picture of a partially erected building appears on one of the leaflets of the Congregational Church Building Society. The foundations are apparently substantial, the walls are well built and high, but the structure is roofless and therefore useless, and above the sketch is written the legend "Roof or ruin." This illustrates excellently the share which the Church Building Society has in the great missionary enterprise of the Congregational churches. The workmen are trained by the C. E. S., the foundations are laid by the S. S. and P. S., the walls are reared by the C. H. M. S. It falls to the C. C. B. S. finally to furnish the roof in order to insure the value and permanence of all the previous work.

Ever since its organization, forty-three years ago, the C. C. B. S. has been the helpmeet of the C. H. M. S. Some one has called it the "Father Society," as the Home Missionary Society is the "Mother Society," for if the mother sets up the new church in housekeeping, is it not the father who builds the house? We hear a great deal in these days about making the church a home, but it is as impossible to do this when occupying a hired hall in a railroad settlement or a sod shanty on the prairie as it is to find the ideal domestic life in a hotel or a boarding house.

A meeting house for every Congregational church organized is the motto of the C. C. B. S. How far we fall short of this is seen in the statement that in 1895 Congregationalists organized 219 churches, but could build only 129 through their Church Building Society. In this respect we are behind the practice of the other denominations. Jan. 1, 1896, there were 665 Congregational churches without a house of worship. Yet it is generally acknowledged that spiritual success is impossible without a church building. The Year-Book shows that forty-five per cent. of the churches organized are dropped. Of those aided by the C. C. B. S. only five per cent. have died, and in these cases the society recovers the money on the mortgage.

This brings us to touch upon the careful administration and the business methods. We never hear of burdening debts in connection with the C. C. B. S. This does not mean that there is always sufficient money to meet the demands from the field. Pitifully far from it. It simply means that its finances are scrupulously managed and that in spite of multitudes of urgent applications it gives aid only so far as the money on hand will permit. In architecture the society has always chosen the simple, serviceable and economical, and by prudent expenditure of its resources has been enabled, according to a statement made last June, to aid in building no less than 2,693 houses of worship for struggling churches and some 500 parsonages for homeless ministers' families.

The C. C. B. S. may be said to furnish covering for roofless churches not only theoretically, because it completes the work of the other societies, but practically in each individual case, since it pays only last bills so the aided church will be out of debt. The conditions which make it possible for a Congregational church to receive help are: "that the church is absolutely needed, that the people have done all they can toward buying the land and building the house." Aid is given from one of three funds: a General Loan Fund, from which grants are made; the Perpetual Loan Fund for church building, from which money is loaned without interest except on payments past due; and the Parsonage Loan Fund, to assist in building parsonages. If aided by a grant the church promises an annual contribution; if by a loan, it pledges to pay back the whole in five years by installments.

By this means the money contributed to the society is constantly being used and is constantly returning to its treasury to be sent forth again. Up to Jan. 1, 1896, over half a million dollars given or loaned to churches has been paid back, and it is interesting to note that more than half of this was the repayment of money granted outright. It will be seen, therefore, that a gift to the C. C. B. S. is a capital investment for a church, a C. E. Society, a Sunday school, a missionary society or an individual. Already there are ten "Endeavor churches" in the West, built by the help of some of our Congregational young people.

We wish that we had space to picture the condition of affairs in Oklahoma. An interesting story is told of the way in which one church was started. Among those who made the rush when the Cherokee Strip was opened was a young woman on horseback. She covered seventeen miles in an hour and ten minutes, secured a quarter section beside her brother's and built a claim shanty. The settlers in her neighborhood longed for religious meetings so she sent for the nearest minister and arranged for Sunday service and a Sunday school in her little cabin. Eventually there was organized a Congregational church of eleven members from five denominations. It has been named the Carrier Church after the young woman who was instrumental in starting it and now it is happy in possessing a little house of its own.

A short time ago Secretary Hood was present at the dedication of an Oklahoma church building which had a notable history. At a place twenty-six miles from the railroad, eleven miles from the nearest Oklahoma post-office and store and nine from the nearest ones in Kansas, one of our home missionaries held religious services in a shanty. Into the little room, only twelve by fifteen feet, a congregation of 125 souls was packed, the minister using the cookstove as a pulpit or a seat. When a church building was proposed a devout Methodist carpenter came forward and offered the land. The night of the rush into the Cherokee Strip he had dedicated an acre to the Lord. He had been praying for a year for a church to be started and nearly wept for joy when his lot was accepted. He, as well as several others, gave the work on the new building, and by dint of labor and sacrifice these poor settlers, with the aid of but $300 from the C. C. B. S., have erected a good, plain church. Cases like these might be multiplied and emphasis should be laid on the significant fact that such churches often see blessed revivals after their houses of worship are dedicated. One church two years after it came into possession of an edifice reported 105 additions on confession of faith, and another after a year had a revival in which there were seventy hopeful conversions.

But what shall we say of the pitiful appeals and promising opportunities upon which the C. C. B. S. is obliged to turn its back for want of money? The mere statement that there are today fifty-three "left over" applications does not in the least indicate the distress and discouragement which this means to the many struggling churches. We recommend our readers to study this list for themselves. Calls for aid come not merely from the sod shanties and dugouts of the prairies or the log huts of the Western forests, but from the brush arbors of the Freedmen, the tepees of the Indian and the adobe huts of the Mexican; from the home missionary fields of Maine and Florida as well as from Texas and Massachusetts. With the work of four missionary societies requiring the encouragement of the C. C. B. S. before success can be assured, no wonder this society has been called the thumb of our home missionary hand, without which we cannot have a good grip on the work.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Nov. 15-21. A Good Education: What It Is and How to Get It. Prov. 8: 1-11; 9: 9, 10.

Every young person is, or ought to be, ambitious for an education. Most of them give their early years to acquiring it. Not a few are obliged to cut it short sooner than they could wish. A large number fail to appreciate the value of schooldays until they are over. To all such a subject like this ought to bring serious reflection. Whether ambitious or indifferent, whether favored with many or few opportunities, whether in the technical process of being educated or in the midst of life's activities, every one deep down in his heart puts a high value upon a good education. He knows it means inward satisfaction and corresponding influence and power.

The Bible nowhere disparages the training of mind, eye, voice, ear and hand. It exalts learning and deprecates ignorance. But the Biblical idea of education embraces more than do many current conceptions of it. Such passages as this in the Proverbs, such words as fell from Christ's lips, make it clear that to be educated one must have something more than a knowledge of mathematics and languages and the fine arts. It is not by pouring in or plastering on information that we educate a child. The true idea, as the derivation of the word shows, is the bringing out of what is in him. The conscience, the will, the heart are to be stirred, and what we call the ego is to be made conscious of its powers and given dominion over all the appetites, passions and capacities of the nature.

Education viewed from this standpoint extends beyond schoolrooms and college halls. Life itself, from the cradle to the grave, becomes the school; no one ever graduates; the only certificates of promotion are the satisfaction and encouragement which, all unbeknown to the world, come in quiet ways to the man as he sees another of life's hard lessons learned, another latent power put to use, another temptation mastered. How foolish ever to think that the time for educating ourselves has gone by. If we still have the teachable, acquisitive spirit we may be learning every day more of the world, more of ourselves, more of our fellowmen, more of God.

God never puts any soul in a situation where it cannot day by day become wiser, truer and better. It is our special privilege each day to be learners in the school of Christ, and, as respects the great future ever opening before us, to offer day by day for ourselves and our fellow-students the prayer which George, as he was going down into the dark valley, offered in Marget's garden in behalf of his heartbroken teacher, Domsie: "May the maister and his scholars meet some mornin' where the schule never skails in the kingdom o' oor Father."

It is the business of the pulpit not to destroy, but to build up. The Christian people of this country ought to be told far more clearly than they have been told by many of their accepted guides who know the truth that many of the results of criticism have been established beyond controversy, that serious opposition on the part of scholars has practically quite ceased, and that for good or for evil the situation has to be faced frankly. On the other hand, it is true that criticism is establishing more and more clearly the existence of a higher element than the merely natural in the Old Testament history.—British Weekly.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE PURITAN IN ENGLAND AND NEW ENGLAND.

In this book Rev. Dr. E. H. Byington has made a valuable addition to the rapidly increasing literature relating to the early colonial history of New England. It contains a series of papers, originally written independently but having a natural mutual relation, and they have been rewritten so far as was essential to render their connection obvious. The result is a very interesting and permanently valuable volume. It affords no new revelations but it makes fresh and effective use of familiar material, and is characterized by thoroughness, discrimination, candor and sympathy. Its style also is clear and vigorous and is eminently readable from cover to cover. Dr. Alexander McKenzie has supplied a graceful introduction.

The book is not a history but rather a series of studies and pictures. Its eight chapters are entitled The Puritan in England; The Pilgrim and the Puritan, Which? The Early Ministers of New England; William Pynchon, Gent.; The Family and Social Life of the Puritans; Religious Opinions of the Fathers of New England; The Case of Rev. Robert Breck, of Springfield; and The Religious Life in the Eighteenth Century in Northern New England. The first is a careful preparatory study, unusually clear and concise. The second inquires whether Pilgrim or Puritan had most to do with shaping subsequent New England character and history. This is the portion of the volume as to which there is likely to be most difference of opinion, and the author appears to us to have done something less than full justice to the influence of the Pilgrims. Moreover, the passage alluding to the influence of Holland upon the institutions established by the Pilgrims in New England, although cautiously written, possibly needs some qualification.

The defense of the Puritan character from the accusations so often recklessly made against it is conspicuously able and successful. Its very temperateness adds to its force. And the pictures, so to speak, of William Pynchon and Robert Breck are drawn skillfully and illustrate well a most effective method of historical narrative. The more strictly theological and religious chapters embody the fruits of much research and are good specimens of concise yet comprehensive statement in the true spirit of the scientific scholar. The book is printed very handsomely and has for frontispiece a fine reproduction of a portrait of William Pynchon. It is amply furnished with indexes and kindred helps. Its price, let us not fail to add, is so low that it ought to have a wide sale. [Roberts Bros. $2.00.]

STORIES.

Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co. have printed a new edition of A Window in Thrums [$2.00], Mr. J. M. Barrie's famous book, from fresh plates and with the addition of some seventy reproductions of photographs taken especially for it by Mr. Clifton Johnson. The result is a fascinating volume, the literary and spiritual charms of which are as vivid as ever, while an additional atmosphere of realism is imparted to it by the illustrations. As we have read it again the author's shrewd insight has impressed us more than ever, and the vigor and the pathos of the book also have seemed more striking. The edition certainly will be a favorite holiday gift.

In The Touch of Sorrow [Henry Holt & Co. $1.00], an anonymous issue in the Protean Series, the author has developed the familiar thought that some experience of sorrow is essential to any life deserving to be called complete. The proof is worked out with something of exceptional freshness and force, and the story, although hardly profound, certainly is highly interesting and suggestive. The characters are English society people and the reader moves in the atmosphere rendered so familiar by scores of modern novels, yet this book is unlike any other which we recall.

In The Green Graves of Balgowrie [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], by Jane H. Findlater, what may be termed the opposite side of the same truth is emphasized. The two heroines, brought up in an atmosphere of suppression and avoidance of the world, by an eccentric, not to say insane, mother, naturally go through the most startling and painful experiences, when they inevitably, at last, come into direct relations with their fellow-beings. If the story have a moral it is that young people should be allowed judiciously selected opportunities for intercourse with others and reasonable amusements. One would doubt, were not truth stranger than fiction, whether such histories as those here narrated are possible, yet many things are possible in Scotland, the scene of the narrative, and in spite of the extreme sadness of the story it enchains the reader, no less by its literary merit and the skill shown in portraying character than by the strange course of events described. If it do not prove a popular book it will, at least, appeal very strongly to many readers.

Robert Atterbury [Cassell Publishing Co. 50 cents], by T. H. Brainerd, belongs to the Unknown Library. Its sub-title, A Study of Love and Life, suggests something of its quality. It discusses true marriage and the relations of the sexes in a lofty and Christian spirit, and is a somewhat striking narrative which should exert a considerable moral influence.

In A Faithful Traitor [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00], by Effie A. Rowland, we have a characteristic English novel about fashionable people, as well as unfashionable, good, bad or indifferent, in town and out of town, noble or almost fiendish, in love. The reader's sympathies would be stirred to a considerable depth now and then if he were not quite certain that all must come out right in the end, as it does. Such iniquity as that of the villain in the plot fortunately is uncommon, but the account of its development and defeat is well managed.

In Love Is a Spirit [Harper & Bros. $1.25], by Julian Hawthorne, the author apparently has indulged himself in following, to some extent, in the footsteps of his distinguished father. The story, which is a psychological sketch rather than a narrative, is dreamy and borders at times on the weird, but is too much elaborated, lacks movement and fails to hold the attention closely. Although it has its good points it cannot be called a strong piece of work.

Several volumes of short stories lie before us. One, by Robert Barr, contains One Day's Courtship and The Heralds of Fame [F. A. Stokes Co. 75 cents]. They are decidedly lively and amusing little tales well adapted to be read in vacation time. ——Lovers of the picturesque, and even the grotesque, in literature will enjoy being led into the realm of ancient Celtic myths and legends after the fashion illustrated by Fiona Macleod in her new book, The Washer of the Ford [Stone & Kimball. $1.25]. There is ample material therein for the author who has appreciation and skill sufficient to grasp and render it into modern phrase, but few are likely to penetrate within it as deeply as this writer. She writes, or rather interprets, with the profoundest sympathy, quite under the influence of the spell of her subject, and she possesses a noteworthy power of spirited and suggestive delineation which is the more impressive because of what it intimates without fully revealing. We should doubt whether her public would be likely to be large, but there can be no doubt that all who care for stories of this quality will rank her productions very high.

Will Carleton has turned from poetry to prose and has published seven short sketches in a volume called The Old Infant and Similar Stories [Harper & Bros. $1.25]. They are characterized by the same familiarity with plain, homely people and their lives which his poems exhibit, and they are excellent character studies and more than ordinarily entertaining as mere tales. They will be widely read.——Compound Interest and Other Stories [Cranston & Curts. 75 cents] by Mrs. O. W. Scott, also is written brightly, deals with the histories of everyday people in a sensible and amusing fashion and is pervaded by a wholesome spiritual influence.——Mr. G. W. Edwards is well known to readers of the Century as an expert in describing and illustrating the sturdy, picturesque and sometimes amusing characteristics of the fishermen and their families along the Maine coast. His little book, Break o' Day and Other Stories [Century Co. $1.00], contains seven terse, graphic and effective sketches, skillfully illustrated and handsomely printed. The book is tiny enough for the pocket, although the type is perfectly readable, and is bound with exceptional good taste and appropriateness.

JUVENILE.

Anna Chapin Ray is well known to the girls as a deservedly popular writer, and in her book, Half a Dozen Girls [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50], she has increased her hold over her readers as a successful blender of good sense and entertainment in story form. The new edition of her book, which has been excellently illustrated by Mr. Frank T. Merrill, will prove a popular holiday gift. It is handsome and captivating. ——The Orcutt Girls [W. A. Wilde & Co. $1.50], by Charlotte M. Vaile, also has been illustrated by Mr. Merrill and also is sure to be popular. An old-fashioned New England academy and its life have suggested the chief scenes, and many older readers will enjoy being thus reminded of early experiences, while the boys and girls will be interested in such pictures of the education and younger life of their fathers and mothers. It is by no means a cause for gratitude that the old-fashioned New England academy has so largely disappeared. It had an important share in the upbuilding of the moral and material progress of the New England of today, and such a book as this does useful service in presenting so successful a portrayal of what it was.

The Prize Cup [Century Co. $1.50], illustrates once more the practical understanding which the author, Mr. J. T. Trow idge, possesses of what young people enjoy reading. Everything which he writes is in large demand and this narrative about real boys, and for them, cannot fail to be appreciated by them as it deserves.——Sindbad, Smith & Co. [Century Co. $1.50], by Albert Stearns, has been amusing many readers during its run in the St. Nicholas by its comical, yet not unduly extravagant, blending of the spirit of modern and ancient times. It is an audacious piece of work and very funny, but not too much exaggerated to retain attention. Reginald Birch has illustrated it skillfully.——From the Century Co. comes also The Sword Maker's Son [$1.50], by W. O. Stoddard. This, too, has been running in St. Nicholas, and is a story of superior merit and solid quality apart from its graphic style. The time is the beginning of the Christian era and the characters and events of early Christian history are prominent and are handled with delicacy and reverence. The book exerts an unobtrusive but genuine and decided Christian influence.

From the American Baptist Publication Society comes The Hathaways' Sister [75 cents], by Anne K. Benedict. It is a Sunday school story, well written, full of interest and helpfully stimulating, setting forth the nobility and success of everyday fidelity to duty in a very pleasant and impressive way.——Somewhat similar, although in a different vein, is Anne Breadalbane's Memories of the Manse [Joseph Knight Co. 50 cents], in which glimpses of Scottish life are afforded which are interesting as historical pictures and also for the light which they throw upon Scottish characteristics. The book is short and simple but a pleasant one.

Pansy, also, has brought out a new book, Making Fate [Lothrop Publishing Co. $1.50]. It is a book for young men and women rather than for children, and has a distinct moral purpose, while it also is a graphic story of young life and, indeed, to some extent a love story. Those who are familiar with the author's earlier works will know what to expect and will not be disappointed. It is a thoroughly characteristic book.——Mrs. Kate Tannatt Woods has written a bright and wholesome story for girls which is called Mopsy, Her Tangles and Triumphs [Lothrop Publishing Co. $1.25]. Its lesson is the simple but ever vitally important one that fidelity, cheerfulness and helpfulness alone render life satisfying and successful. It is vivacious in style and uplifting in spirit and is likely to be popular in spite of its illustrations.——The Twins and Their Troubles [Cong. S. S. & Pub. Soc. 75 cents], by L. Amelia Wilder, are the same little girls described in The Twins and Their Texts. Their story is continued in these pages entertainingly, and the younger children will gain from their story many suggestions of goodness and also will thoroughly enjoy reading about them.——How the Children Raised the Wind [Fleming H. Revell Co. 50 cents] is by Edna Lyall, and she has described how some children succeeded in securing the extinction of a church debt, in her usual sympathetic and graphic style. The story is more entertaining than probable, but this is no matter.

Daddy Jake, the Runaway, and Other Stories Told After Dark [Century Co. $1.25], is another collection by "Uncle Remus," Mr. J. C. Harris, mainly in his familiar vein and fascinating for the mature as well as the young. Nothing more than this needs to be said. One knows what to expect and will not be disappointed. The illustrations by E. W. Kemble are as good as the stories and that is saying a great deal.——Short Stories for Short People [E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50], by Alice Aspinwall, with illustrations by Marie L. Danforth, is declared by Col. T. W. Higginson in his preface to be strikingly in the vein of Grimm's Household Tales and Hans Andersen's stories. This is high praise but it seems to be justified. The audacity of imagination which some of the tales exhibit is rendered more conspicuous by the simplicity, force and artistic skill of the style. The illustrations are in keeping with the text and the younger children, for whom the book is meant, will not fail to rank it at its proper worth.

Mr. E. S. Brooks has prepared The Century Book of Famous Americans [Century Co. $1.50] as a companion volume to his Century Book for Young Americans. It is issued under the auspices of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution. It describes an imaginary pilgrimage of a company of young people to some of the historic homes of America, those of Washington, the Adamses, Webster, Lincoln, Jefferson and others. It is illustrated lavishly and appropriately and is capitally written. It ought to be a highly popular holiday book.——From the same publishers comes Rhymes of the States [$1.00], by Garrett Newkirk. There is a map of each State, illustrations suggestive of its characteristic products or other leading features, a few important facts and statistics are given and a short poem relating to each commonwealth accompanies the other kindred material. One cannot say much for the quality of the poetry, but the book as a whole is highly attractive and seems to be adapted to catch the attention of the young successfully, and impress the information which it contains.

EDUCATIONAL.

A new edition is out of the late R. H. Quick's Essays on Educational Reform [C. W. Bardeen. $1.00]. It reproduces the original London edition of 1868, with sundry additions, including the author's pedagogical autobiography, his chapter on Froebel, which he wrote for the Encyclopedia Britannica, divers illustrations, notes, etc. It is a volume which educators have found, and long will continue to find, practically suggestive as well as eminently readable.——Prof. C. F. Richardson of Dartmouth has revised his Primer of American Literature [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 35 cents], and has appended pages containing the portraits and homes of eight eminent American authors and the combined comprehensiveness and scholarly merit of the book will increase its already wide hold upon the educational public.——The Making of the British Empire (A. D. 1714 to 1832) [Charles Scribner's Sons. 50 cents] is by Arthur Hassall and is the sixth of The Oxford Manual of English History. Like the earlier volumes it is a terse, well-balanced and graphic history of England during the period covered, moderate in price and small in size, although by no means condensed undesirably. It has solid and lasting value.

A third edition of Dr. W. J. Rolfe's Hints for Teachers has been issued in the form of a little volume, The Elementary Study of English [Harper & Bros. 36 cents], in which the passages to which the notes formerly referred now are included, thus making a complete work. One or two short papers on kindred themes are included in the volume, the whole of which illustrates the author's eminent qualifications for his task.——Poems and Prose Passages from the Works of James Russell Lowell [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 40 cents], compiled by Josephine E. Hodgdon, belongs to the Riverside Literature Series and makes a pleasant little book, suited for use in either the home or the school.——The Story of Greece [American Book Co. 60 cents] is one of the Eclectic School Readings Series and has been prepared by H. A. Guerber with a good understanding of what such a book ought to be.

Modern Greek is not the subject of frequent study in this country, but is likely to become more prominent in the future, and the student of ancient Greek will find no little advantage in examining A Practical Method in the Modern Greek Language [Ginn & Co. $2.10], by Eugene Rizo-Rangabe. His purpose is to aid foreigners traveling in Greece, as well as foreign residents, to acquire the current tongue of the country, and the principles of Greek grammar are carefully presented, distinction everywhere being made between the forms of the literary or polite language and those of the common idiom. The book is well supplied with vocabularies, forms of correspondence and other practically valuable material, and will answer its purpose better than any other book of the sort. Indeed, we know of no other volume which has the same purpose.——Teachers will welcome the new issue of Greek Inflection [Ginn & Co. 60 cents], by B. F. Harding, which in small compass supplies a large number of words for written use as paradigms and also suggests a systematic and scientific treatment of the noun and verb.

Conversational German is one thing and book German another, and the American student too often finds himself upon entering Germany to be far more familiar with the latter than with the former. The purpose of Praktische Anfangsgründe [D. C. Heath & Co. 70 cents] is to promote knowledge of conversational German. To this end selections have been made and the whole trend of the book directed. It contains a grammar and a vocabulary. It is printed neatly.——The Facts of Life [Charles Scribner's Sons. 80 cents] is the first volume of a new French series illustrating psychological methods of teaching and studying languages. In this volume home life, the school, traveling and plants suggested the material. The authors are Victor Bétis and Howard Swan and the lessons deal with experiences of daily life, as connected with these topics, very much in detail. It seems to be skillfully adapted to its purpose.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Talks About Autographs [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $3.50], by Dr. George Birkbeck Hill, is one of those books which appeal particularly to the litterateur. The collection, a considerable portion of which is described and many examples of which are reproduced in facsimile, must be exceptionally interesting as well as valuable. Mr. Hill is rather the editor than the author of the book, and by choice. He has thrown his material into a pleasant order, letting name suggest name and reminiscence suggest reminiscence without much attempt at systematic classification, but with entire success. Among the eminent persons whose letters are cited are Jane Austen, Matthew Arnold, James Boswell, Lord Brougham, Browning, Carlyle, King Charles I., Miss Edgeworth, Fénelon, Rowland Hill, the late Dr. Jowett, Longfellow, Harriet Martineau, Cardinal Newman, Daniel O'Connell, Palmerston, George Washington, Charles Sumner, Garrison and the Duke of Wellington. The letters are connected by links of narrative and characterization in the author's own pleasant manner, and some portraits as well as facsimiles of handwriting are found among the illustrations. The publishers have issued the work in a handsome and substantial form.

Dr. C. C. Abbott's contributions to the literature of bird life are among the most welcome, and his new book, Bird Land Echoes [J. B. Lippincott Co. $2.00], deals in his familiar descriptive and pictorial style with the sparrow, warbler, robin, thrush, kingbird, cuckoo, heron, plover, hawk and many others of the birds which an expert like him knows to be common in this country, but most of which are almost unknown by a dweller in cities, except in such pages as his. He discusses in a pleasant conversational style the birds and their habits, and the reader not only becomes interested in them but learns much about them. Even the bird expert must appreciate the comparison of experiences and observations thus rendered possible. Like all the author's publications the book ranks very high in the literature of out of door life, and happy is the boy or girl who lives where there is opportunity to study bird life and into whose hands these books have fallen. Mr. W. E. Cram has increased the value of the book largely by his numerous and beautiful illustrations.

A second series of Little Journeys to the Homes of American Authors [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75] has been issued and contains papers written apparently for Putnam's Monthly in 1853. Most of the writers, among whom were George William Curtis, George S. Hillard, William Cullen Bryant and E. T. Tuckerman, are dead, but Edward Everett Hale and Parke Godwin still survive. The authors considered are Emerson, Bryant, Prescott, Lowell, Hawthorne, Irving, Taylor, Bancroft and others. Portraits and, in some instances, pictures of their houses are supplied and the little volume is dainty and attractive from cover to cover.

Rev. J. H. Weeks, who read some time ago to the Westboro Historical Society several short original sketches, has gathered them into a pretty little book, The Tin Kitchen [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 75 cents]. The other stories, entitled The Old Clock, The Teapot, and the Satin Shoes, resemble the first one in having been suggested by objects of antiquarian interest, dating back to a time before the Revolution, and the author has used his material skillfully and charmingly. They have been printed in response to a public demand and will find a hearty welcome.

NOTES.

—— The sales of the weekly pictorial papers in England are increasing fast.

—— English authorities describe the sale of fiction as "increasingly and noticeably more ephemeral each year."

—— An authorized biography of the late William Morris is to be prepared by J. W. Mackail, of the Education Department, London.

—— The late Sir John Millais left a fortune of about $1,250,000. He painted some 300 pictures and received on the average $5,000 for them.

—— Two of the earlier books of the late Mr. Froude, says the Book Buyer, were suppressed by him, The Nemesis of Faith and Shadows of the Clouds. The former has been reprinted in the United States but not even the British Museum has a copy of the latter.

—— The library of the late Henry Phillips, Jr., of Philadelphia consisting largely of works on numismatics and on German and Spanish literature, has been added to that of Johns Hopkins University, which institution also has just received a collection of volumes relating to the Jesuits and the early colonization of this country.

—— The wisdom of the art commissioners who rejected Mr. MacMonnies's nude statue, The Bacchante, which the architect of the new Boston Public Library offered to give to be set up in the inner court, has been abundantly approved. The objection to its reception, the entire unsuitableness of such a figure to such a place, is conceded to be unanswerable by almost everybody.

—— We are heartily glad to learn that Mr. Frank Foxcroft, so long connected with the Boston Journal, has become editor of Littell's Living Age, that old but ever young eclectic which is such a household favorite. Several important changes in the conduct of the magazine are announced—occasional translations from the French, Spanish, German or Italian magazines and a monthly supplement of readings from new books, etc.—and a new era of prosperity and popularity undoubtedly is before it.

—— It is pleasant to know that the late Mr. Du Maurier bore voluntary testimony to the fact that his American publishers, Messrs. Harper & Bros., dealt with him not only fairly and liberally from the first but also that they voluntarily increased their payments to him very largely as the popularity of his writings became evident. Punch, by the way, already reveals too plainly that Du Maurier is dead and that his mantle has fallen upon nobody as yet. Mr. Philip May is to be his successor and his style fortunately is so different that comparisons will not be made as freely as otherwise they might be.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

Members of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage are still entertaining their audiences with experiences in England, and echoes of the same Pilgrimage continue on the other side of the ocean. A correspondent from England writes, "The men of the Mayflower have seldom furnished more illustrations for sermons and speeches than since your visit revived the old scenes."

Such noble work as that just completed in a district of Wisconsin meets obstacles of varied kinds, but a chief cause of disappointment arises when the movement reaches the stage of organization and no willing persons are found who can be relied upon to step forward and assume leadership when the organizers withdraw. Such circumstances press home forcibly the need of more of these consecrated pioneers. Then the fertile fields, however rough at first occupation, can be cultivated more highly and for a longer time, until the spirit of the laborers is so strongly engrafted into the growing members as to make them locally self-sustaining.

It was a motherly act—that of Pilgrim Church, St. Louis, in giving a farewell reception to the pastor of Compton Hill Church, which is one of the most vigorous scions of the Pilgrim stock. If all churches who object to hearing candidates would state their position as clearly and frankly as the Compton Hill, it would go far toward bringing about a reform in this matter.

A suggestion for conducting prayer meetings comes from Kansas which may prove helpful to overworked ministers and pastorless churches. Lay conferences in the absence of a preacher also find favor in the Sunflower State.

When churches unite in such a mission enterprise as a New Hampshire item describes, it is evident that the Christian spirit, which has for its end saving men, is dominant over the merely denominational.

If there must be church entertainments, we commend the "talent work" instituted by a ladies' missionary society in a State of the Central West.

"All one body we" would have been an appropriate motto for one of our theological seminaries on a certain occasion last week.

A C. E. Society of Maine has tried to do its share in bringing young people into the church.

THE COLORADO STATE MEETING.

It seemed well to the assembled pastors and delegates from the various churches that once again the association should sit within the walls of the First Church, Denver, the eldest sister of them all. If anything were needed to strengthen this feeling of pleasure it was present in the genial welcome of Dr. J. H. Ecob and his people, whose influence reaches out beyond their immediate sphere. Quietly but steadily Colorado has been reaching out after men, until now some of the best thinkers of the country are here.

The Baptist Association and the Presbyterian Synod, meeting in Denver at the same time, sent greetings to us, and one evening the Presbyterian and Congregational bodies held a union devotional meeting.

One of the strongest features of the association program was a discussion of Teaching Religion in Institutions of Higher Education. President Slocum of Colorado College made the proposition that there must be a high ideal of scholarship. Chancellor McDowell of Denver University enforced the idea, and Dr. J. B. Gregg pointed out the struggle now going on in this country between the Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic methods of education. Then Dr. Ecob gave a dramatic and solemn warning to our own country, calling attention to the fact that we are not alive to the conflict on hand, that the Teutonic idea—the widest intellectual culture—is increasing when it should decrease. Dr. Charles Caverno spoke of the high Christian life and culture among both faculty and students of the State University at Boulder.

The women's meetings were of great interest, the presence of Mrs. H. S. Caswell of Boston adding much to their value. At different times she gave several stimulating talks. Mrs. J. H. Ecob read a paper on Tolstoi's Legend of the Three Mendicants, which was followed by discussion. Foreign missions were considered from a higher point of view than sometimes is the case. The reactionary value of them was emphasized and elaborated.

The work of home missions in Colorado received special attention. The varied and complicated duties of Superintendent Sanderson were brought out, and the comforting assurance of appreciation given him by those who have expected strong and efficient work should be an inspiration to him. The association expressed appreciation of the grand work of the Church Building Society, but requested that it consider whether an improved method of granting aid might not be adopted, the special point for consideration being the blanket mortgage which covers the amount granted and gifts secured from other sources than itself; also that on payment of the sum actually granted a release be immediately executed. Secretary Taintor expressed for the society willingness to be directed by the churches, but added that present methods were carefully wrought out of experience.

A resolution was passed expressing appreciation of the life and work of the late Rev. C. M. Sanders and the sense of loss in his death.

A TRANSFER FROM THE WEST TO THE EAST.

A little over six months ago the First Church of North Brookfield, Mass., was left pastorless by the resignation of Rev. A J. Dyer. Last week Tuesday his successor, Rev. J. L. Sewall, was formally installed in the pastorate where for a short time he has been supplying. The exercises were marked by warm cordiality, especially at the impressive reception of the pastor and his family to membership in the church. Delightful musical selections added variety to the service. The surrounding towns were largely represented at the morning and afternoon services, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton preached the sermon.

Rev. John L. Sewall was born in Lunenburg, Vt., in 1856, and lived there until 1865, when his family removed to Norwich, Vt., where he fitted for college at the local academy. He graduated from Dartmouth in 1877, and then for two years was principal of the preparatory department of Olivet College, Michigan. In 1882 he graduated from Andover Seminary in the class with President Hyde of Bowdoin, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton and other well-known pastors of New England. During his seminary course he spent a year as the leader of the mission work at the chapel of the First Church, Chelsea, Mass. After his student days Mr. Sewall held pastorates in Westminster and Milton, Vt., and was largely instrumental in organizing C. E. work in that State. In 1888 he was settled over the Church of the Pilgrimage, Plymouth, Mass., and after a year of religious journalism, assisting President Clark in the office of The Golden Rule, he entered the service of the Congregational City Missionary Society in St. Louis, Mo., developing a new territory in the western part of the city and organizing Central Church, where Rev. C. S. Sargent, D. D., is now pastor. For the last three years, as pastor of the Clyde Church, Kansas City, Mo., he has been greatly interested in the development of city missionary and educational work in Missouri; he has been active in Endeavor circles in Missouri and Kansas, specially interested in the good citizenship movement and the work among the Juniors, having a society of the latter consisting of five members in his own home.

DR. BEACH INSTALLED AT MINNEAPOLIS.

Rev. D. N. Beach, D. D , who was installed pastor of Plymouth Church, Minneapolis, Minn., Oct. 27, is well known to our readers as one of the leaders among younger ministers, and his successful work at Westerly, R. I., Wakefield and Cambridge, Mass., indicates his fitness for this leading pulpit of the Northwest, where he has already won the love and esteem of his church and his brethren.

Plymouth Church was organized April 28, 1857, and from the first has taken an active interest in local affairs as well as in denominational work throughout the world. It has had in its pastors a strong line of leaders. It has steadily grown with the city until it has become one of the strongest of our faith in the country. The only missionary aid this church has ever received was a grant of a few hundred dollars from the A. M. A., and possibly this may account in part for their early interest in the abolition of slavery. The following minute is found on the church records of April 4, 1860: "The house of worship of Plymouth Church was destroyed by fire at midnight last night by the hand of some fiend in human shape in retaliation for the faithfulness of our pastor (Rev. H. M. Nichols) in the cause of temperance."

PLYMOUTH CHURCH, MINNEAPOLIS.

The council was by far the largest ever called in the Northwest, consisting of forty-nine churches and twenty-six individuals. Rev. H. H. Hart was moderator and Rev. T. M. Edmands scribe. The statement of Dr. Beach was unusually full and most carefully prepared. The council adopted unanimously the following minute embodying the result of their findings:

The council called by Plymouth Church to advise as to the installation of Rev. David N. Beach, D. D., has had placed before it the usual documentary evidence of the church, church membership and ecclesiastical standing of the pastor elect. It has listened to a most full, frank statement of his religious views, alike wherein they agree with and differ from those which have been commonly received among us.

We unite in our appreciation of the spirit of Dr. Beach, the emphasis and clearness with which he has borne witness to the Trinity, the divine personality of Jesus Christ, the fatherhood of God, the sinfulness of sin and the wondrous grace of redemption. We record our assured confidence that in his preaching and living he exalts Jesus Christ as our Lord and Saviour, as the world's only hope.

We declare that the fellowship of Congregational churches, though never given without regard to the intellectual conception of truth, is not tied by them alone, but is rather given upon the spirit, temper and proportion in which views are held.

On these grounds, therefore, we advise the church to proceed with the installation and profess our readiness to assist in the same.

The sermon was preached by Prof. W. D. MacKenzie, D. D. The installing prayer was offered by Rev. Alexander McGregor. The right hand of fellowship was extended by Rev. G. D. Black. The welcome to the city fell to Rev. Pleasant Hunter, D. D., the charge to pastor to Rev. George R. Merrill, D. D., and the address to people to Rev. E. P. Ingersoll, D. D.

Dr. MacKenzie's sermon was from the text in 1 John 3: 2, 3. In a strong, forceful way he set forth in three propositions: (a) Whence am I? (b) Whither am I going? (c) What ought I to do?

The last four years, in common with other churches, have been especially trying to Plymouth Church. Perhaps more than any other leading church in this region this church has suffered from the financial stress. Man after man among its strongest supporters has been compelled to yield to the inevitable, and this has not only crippled the local work, but it has also kept the church from sustaining its world-wide record in generosity for benevolences. But, in spite of all this and in the face of the serious fact of being a down-town church with an uptown constituency, strong indications are not wanting that they are entering upon a new era of prosperity and power. With her well-organized home plant and her efficient missions the good work is going forward. The pastor's large-hearted, whole-souled personality is impressing itself upon the membership of this great church.

It would seem that there is eminent fitness between Dr. Beach and his environment in this busy, strategic center in the upper Mississippi Valley, where his catholicity, his spirit of brotherhood, his ideas of church unity may find scope. Perhaps not primarily as a theologian will Dr. Beach impress himself most fully upon this community, but as preacher and man living in the midst of men, striving ever to help them to see what Christ yearns to have fulfilled in them. Plymouth Church pulpit also affords an opportunity for its present incumbent to give to the community the fruits of his former activity along some lines in which he is an acknowledged organizer and leader.

THE ASSOCIATION OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

The little town of Claremont with its "big" Pomona College, in being chosen as the place of our tenth annual meeting, said, "Come and see." We went, saw and were conquered. The sessions lasted through Oct. 13–15, the services being held in the college chapel.

We were welcomed in the great gospel tent where tables were spread for 150 guests to dinner, and where the pastor, Rev. W. H. McDougal, gave us a greeting. The prayer, the right words and the Spirit's presence led up to the message in the sermon preached by Rev. Herbert Lathe on the text, He Saw a Man. The discourse was an earnest plea for recognition by the church of the claims of the individual.

Organization was effected by the selection of Rev. L. H. Frary as moderator. The attendance was unusually large. Rev. J. K. McLean, right from the northern association, spoke greetings and reported a wonderful clearing of the religious atmosphere in that section.

A State Sunday law is again receiving earnest attention, and G. A. Gibbs, Esq., presented an admirable paper showing the legal and practical sides of the question. A petition for the legislature will be circulated among all our churches.

The missionary Sunday school work is still under the efficient guidance of Supt. H. P. Case, who for the last ten years has been planting and nurturing such schools. During the year he formed eighteen new schools, with a total membership of 500. Seventy-five mission schools are upon the list. Twenty-two churches have grown out of mission schools, and in our church schools are enrolled over 7,000 members. The Congregational schools on this coast have formed themselves into an educational alliance, from which flows a deeper mutual interest.

Dr. McLean brought out a somewhat novel feature of seminary work—a two years' course for young men and women wishing to prepare for Christian work. Besides their course of study they engage in personal work and give reports of it.

Pomona College, its needs, its worth, its growing oppertunities, was foremost in all minds at an appointed time. We joined in the morning chapel worship and saw the 165 students—as fine a body of young men and women as can be seen within college walls. The Freshman Class numbers forty-five, only eight years after the college was founded. The sight inspired in our hearts a spirit of love and consecration to the interests of the institution. Somehow the $40,000 for endowment still lacking to win the $100,000 must come before Jan. 1.

The condition of the churches, mission and others, was brought out by Supt. J. T. Ford. Hard times have been evident, but more church debts have been paid than usual. Four meeting houses have been built, and San Diego has $18,000 pledged for a new edifice. About 300 additions are recorded on confession, although there have been no great ingatherings through revival effort.

A satisfactory paper upon the National Council Manual, by Rev. N. T. Edwards, led to a resolution approving that work and commending it to the churches. The subject of temperance was presented by Rev. J. R. Knodell in a pungent paper deprecating seeming apathy in the churches only a few of which have well-developed plans of action. He suggested that every church have its Anti-saloon League. The association indorsed the American Anti-saloon League.

Time fails to tell of all the other good things adequately. Rev. D. W. Bartlett presented the latest thought in regard to church provision for mutual help in poverty and sickness. The Gospel Qualification for Church Membership was clearly put; the missionary stress was pressed upon our hearts by those who feel the sacredness of the world embracing commission; and sympathy was expressed for Armenia. Almost every church has sent an offering! After voting to meet in Redlands next year and feeling the tenderness of mutual and divine fellowship, the association adjourned in the spirit of consecration to personal work for the Master. C. S. V.

A NEW BOSTON EDIFICE CONSECRATED.

A red letter day, Oct. 27, was added to the history of the Roslindale Church of Boston, for at that time its new and commodious meeting house was consecrated to Christian work and worship. The new building is situated on Ashland Street, in the center of a residential district. It is a frame building about sixty-five by ninety feet in size. The auditorium and the chapel may be connected so as to form one large audience-room of cruciform shape, which, with the gallery, will accommodate 800 persons. The choir is placed in the rear of the pulpit, the choir-room being at one side and the pastor's room at the other. The social apartments comprise a supper-room, kitchen, pantry, cloak-room and lobbies, conveniently arranged in a high and airy basement. The building is heated by steam and is well ventilated.

The first substantial encouragement to the church to "arise and build" came in an unusual way. About six months after the church was organized the records of a small Congregational church which had been formed a generation before, but had long been disbanded, were unexpectedly placed in the hands of the pastor, Rev. R. B. Grover. A vote was therein recorded giving to the church in Hyde Park, then but recently organized, the sum of $350, the proceeds from the sale of property belonging to the church. This vote also provided that if a Congregational church were ever organized in the community the Hyde Park church should refund the money and as much more as it would be able. A copy of the old vote being sent to the Hyde Park church, the latter responded at once with a check for $500. This sympathetic action so encouraged the new enterprise that a lot was purchased at once after a careful selection and $1,300 were paid down, leaving a mortgage of $2,000. To stimulate the church still further Mr. C. B. Botsford, a resident of West Roxbury, promised to give $800 toward the payment of this mortgage, provided the balance could be secured within a specified time. Pastor and people set to work with a will, and the mortgage was canceled within the time appointed. Its lot thus being paid for, a subscription was started for a building fund. Mr. James Murray, a member of the church, was engaged as the architect, and now after much labor and great sacrifice, after much prayer and many hopes deferred, the church rejoices in the possession of its beautiful home.

To the building fund Mr. Botsford again subscribed $500. Mr. John Denison and the late W. O. Grover each subscribed a like sum. Messrs. Samuel Johnson, J. H. Gray, M. B. Mason and Charles Morss have also given large amounts, and several hundred dollars were received from the Pilgrim Association of Boston Churches. The clock was placed in the tower by the city for the benefit of the community. The bell, weighing nearly 2,300 pounds and costing $500, was the gift of a long honored and beloved resident, the late Mr. John Pearce.

The exercises on Tuesday evening were interesting and helpful. The sermon, preached by Rev. G. A. Gordon, D. D., was uplifting. Addresses were given by Rev. Drs. E. L. Clark and Arthur Little, and Dr. P. B. Davis offered the prayer, which was preceded by an act of consecration arranged and led by the pastor. Two hymns written for the occasion were sung by the congregation. Others assisting in the service were the pastors of the Baptist and Methodist churches and Rev. Messrs. W. R. Campbell, J. B. Seabury and Joshua Coit. On Wednesday evening an informal reception was held, the entire building being thrown open to inspection. A large company of friends came to the housewarming.

With its home now completed, the church is looking forward with deep interest and prayer to a new era of prosperity. Labor and sacrifice have characterized the church from the beginning, but the Lord has been with his people and richly blessed their efforts. The church was organized Nov. 10, 1890, with the present pastor as leader. Beginning with sixty-five members, the church now numbers over 200 resident communicants.

THE NEW MEXICO ASSOCIATION.

For the first time this association has tried the experiment of holding two sessions a year, the annual gathering occurring in April. The fall meeting was held Oct. 21, 22 at Albuquerque, the "hub" of New Mexico, Congregationally speaking at least. The subjects chosen were of such character as to make the gathering more of a retreat for meditation and quickening in spiritual life than an occasion for discussing methods and transacting business.

The membership of the body is small and the attendance was less than usual, first, because the number of New West teachers has been reduced by the abandonment of one of the Education Society's academies and the temporary suspension of the other, thus decreasing the number of teachers in the territory from thirteen to seven; and, second, because the cut in the home missionary apportionment for the current year has involved the reduction of the salaries in some of the fields so that the missionaries were unable to bear the heavy expense of coming. Missionaries and teachers, isolated as they are, appreciate keenly the value of fellowship, but there are few religious gatherings of any sort in the territory except these associations, and the distances—the English-speaking churches averaging over 200 miles apart—make the assembling of the Congregational forces of New Mexico a difficult undertaking. The desire for more frequent meetings, however, has overcome many obstacles.

The topic of the first session was Service, the treatment of which aroused the central thought of the meeting. Papers were presented on Its Object and Nature by Rev. F. H. Allen, Its Field by Mrs. G. E. Birlew, and Its Motives by Rev. P. A. Simpkin. One session was devoted to the Sunday school, the subjects being: The Place of the Sunday School in the Development of the Church by Mr. H. E. Fox, Who Should Be in the Sunday School and How to Keep Them by Mr. J. C. Speers and The Relation of the Teacher to the Success of the School by Prof. C. E. Hodgin. These papers drew out an interesting discussion, in which the responsibility of teachers was frequently emphasized and a high ideal set for them. The Christian Leader formed the topic of another session, with papers on Elements of Success by Rev. E. H. Ashmun, The Christian Leader in Business by Mr K. A. Snyder, and The Christian Leader's Temptations by Miss I. L. Frost. The sermon was preached by Rev. F. H. Allen, followed by the Lord's Supper.

The experiences of the missionaries and teachers given in the closing session were exceedingly interesting and sometimes thrilling. Home and foreign missions are intermingled in this territory, the Mexican work presenting all of the difficulties and most of the sacrifices faced by those who have crossed the seas. E. H. A.

FROM CANADA.

Among the Churches.

October is an unusually active month in Canadian Congregationalism. The resignations of Rev. John Morton at Hamilton and Rev. W. B. Forbush at Yarmouth are both greatly regretted. Mr. Morton faithfully served the church at Hamilton for fifteen years, and now retires by reason of severe family affliction, while Mr. Forbush proved himself, during his short stay in Canada, to be an enthusiastic and progressive worker. His Canadian friends wish him continued success across the line. The other side of the picture presents the termination of a long vacancy at Zion, Toronto, by the settlement of Rev. Horace Peckover of Kingston, Jamaica; the opening of the church edifice at Westmount, Montreal, on Oct. 25; the reopening of the Embro edifice on the same day after extensive repairs; and most successful special services at Calvary, Kingston, conducted by Rev. A. W. Main.

The Montreal Club.

On the eve of October the Montreal Club called a special meeting for the purpose of welcoming Mr. J. Wycliff Wilson, one of the directors of the Congregational Colonial Missionary Society, who is now making a tour round the world. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Messrs. E. C. Evans, D. D., Principal Barbour, D. D., Professor Warriner, M. A., and E. M. Hill, M. A., and by Messrs. J. R. Dougall, Charles Cushing, C. R. Black and C. T. Williams. Rev. Dr. Williams of San Francisco and Mr. Pratt of Minneapolis were also present and gave interesting addresses. Mr.

Wilson, in responding, assured the club of the continued interest of the society which he represented in Canadian work, and it is generally believed that what he saw and heard while in Montreal will result in more practical sympathy from English friends on behalf of the churches of the Dominion.

The College Opening.

Two days after this gathering of the Montreal clubs was the opening of the Congregational college in the same city. Mr. J. R. Dougall, chairman of the board, presided, and in his address made mention of the fact that the coming session would be specially important because of the resignation at the close of Principal Barbour. An interesting review of the work of the college was made by Professor Warriner, who also spoke with much encouragement upon the present outlook of the institution. Rev. William McIntosh of Ottawa then followed with the annual address, which was a strong appeal for an efficient, well-trained spiritual ministry. The students are now hard at work, and, in harmony with Mr. McIntosh's earnest advice, are making good use of their time.

Endeavor Rally at Ottawa.

Interest was next transferred to Ottawa, where there was held in connection with the Dominion Christian Endeavor Convention a splendid Congregational rally. Apart from this gathering, it is interesting to note the important places that Congregationalists had in the meetings and on the program of the general convention. Three presidents of provincial unions—Rev. Messrs. A. F. McGregor from Ontario, W. T. Gunn from Quebec and J. W. Cox from the Maritime Provinces—were in attendance, while Rev. Messrs. E. M. Hill, William McIntosh and H. J. Horsey, and Messrs. J. R. Dougall and C. J. Atkinson were prominent in different meetings. Nor should it be forgotten that the visit of the delegates on the conclusion of the convention to Aylmer, the birthplace of Rev. Francis E. Clark, was to Congregational ground that is now known the world over. It is not surprising, then, that the rally was marked by enthusiasm, and that the speeches and addresses were of a high order. One significant fact of the rally was the address of Rev. William McIntosh, which referred to The Model Church as ably outlined by a Methodist minister at the convention, and pointed out that such a church was possible of realization only under the Congregational polity.

Convention at Melbourne.

Melbourne next became the center of attraction when the Quebec Branch of the Woman's Board of Missions met in annual convention. The first paper by Mrs. W. H. Abbott of Lennoxville, on Missionary Kindergartens, was followed by a discussion in which Miss James told of the good work carried on by kindergartens in Chicago, and Miss Dougall urged such institutions for the churches. Mrs. Cross of Melbourne read a paper on the work of Mrs. Judson in India, and in the evening another paper on Do Missions Pay? was read by Mrs. Sanderson for Mrs. Miner of Granby. Miss Dougall followed with a splendid address on Modern Phœbes. Before taking up the election of officers on the second morning, Mrs. Brown of Montreal read an appropriate paper on Advantages and Disadvantages of Permanent Officers. Three other papers were given during the day by Miss Richardson, Miss James and Mrs. Stockwell; and in the evening a Review of Rev. W. T. Currie's work in Africa, an address by Miss James on Mission Work in Chicago, and a Question Drawer brought a very successful convention to its close.

Toronto's District Association.

Toronto, a few days later, became the center of Congregational interest when the district association of that locality held its regular quarterly meeting with the Parkdale Church. An emphatic resolution was placed on record asking churches not to concur in the ordination of men not possessing scholastic attainments, while vacant churches were asked to consult the credential committee, so that they may, in a measure, be guarded against men who are not properly recommended. The association authorized this committee to do service for the churches similar to that which is given by the Massachusetts Board of Supply. The evening meeting was taken up with the consideration of foreign mission work. Rev. T. B. Hyde, president of the Evangelical Association, which is carrying on undenominational work in South America, spoke earnestly on the needs of that country, and was followed by Rev. Horace Peckover, who spoke on the West Indies, and Lieutenant-Colonel Elliott, who spoke on China.

THREE NOTEWORTHY ANNIVERSARIES.

The North Church, Springfield, Mass., celebrated the 50th anniversary of its organization last week Sunday with special exercises. The pastor, Rev. F. B. Makepeace, preached a historical sermon, calling forth the heroism of the early founders and stating that the charter members numbered 22, an equal number of men and women. The first pastor was Dr. R. H. Seeley, and others were Rev. Messrs. James Drummond, L. C. Seelye, D. D., R. G. Greene, during whose pastorate the present beautiful stone edifice was erected, Washington Gladden, D. D., and Charles Van Norden. Mr. Makepeace was called to the pastorate Oct. 6, 1888, and began work two months later. During those two months the last payment was made on the church debt and the society stood free for the first time in 40 years. The present pastorate has been one of success and growth, and today the church is one of the leaders in the city and vicinity. The evening service was a union meeting with South and Memorial Churches. Dr. Gladden gave the principal address, and words of greeting were given by Rev. F. L. Goodspeed of First Church and Rev. Dr. J. L. R. Trask of Memorial Church, the daughter of the North Church. Monday evening literary exercises were held with addresses by several of the city pastors and by Dr. Seelye.

The celebration of the 75th anniversary of Trinitarian Church, Taunton, Mass, last week Sunday was an occasion of interest in the church life of the city. In 1821 the church separated from the old First Parish, now Unitarian, which dates back to 1639. During these 75 years the Trinitarian Church has been the mother of three other churches and it has had but five pastors. The present pastor, Rev. S. V. Cole, preached the anniversary sermon and was assisted in the morning service by Dr. S. M. Newman, of Washington, an ex-pastor, and Dr. S. H. Emery, who participated in laying the corner stone of the present stone edifice in 1851. The dedication of the memorials, which the church has placed to its first two pastors, formed a special feature of the occasion. They consist of a glass mosaic tablet, the first of its kind to be placed in any New England church, and of a three paneled window in the apse containing a life size figure of the Good Shepherd with the vine and passion flower on either side gracefully entwined on crosses. Both the men thus remembered died in the service of the church—the actual pastorate of the one covering but eight months and that of the other extending over 45 years. On Sunday evening reminiscences of the early history of the church were heard from several members of the congregation. The celebration concluded with a reception and banquet Monday evening, at which Dr. Newman and the only other living ex-pastor of the church, Dr. H. P. DeForest, of Detroit, gave addresses, the former on Congregationalism and the latter on The Church of the Future. Responses by the pastors of sister churches and others were also given. The fine weather, large attendance and enthusiastic interest helped to make the celebration memorable.

The church in Goffstown, N. H., celebrated the 125th anniversary of its organization Oct. 30, successfully carrying out the attractive program which had previously been arranged. The attendance completely filled the house. The historical address was by Hon. Samuel Upton and was a replete compilation of interesting facts. During this time twelve pastors have served the church. Rev. H. H. Wentworth is the present pastor, who has served since June, 1892. The church has been remarkably fortunate in its calls to the pastorate and the accessions on confession have been many during each term. For the first ten years the Presbyterians, who chiefly occupied the south part of the town, were united with the Congregationalists, but preferring complete independence they finally withdrew. In 1801 a plan of union was again effected, but continued only five years, when a final withdrawal occurred. Addresses at the exercises were made by Rev. Messrs. S. L. Gerould and W. R. Cochrane and by the Methodist and Baptist pastors in town. Letters from two former pastors were read. On Sunday morning, Nov. 1, an anniversary sermon was preached by the pastor. The musical program was attractive. The exercises throughout were of such a character as to make the occasion a red letter day in the history of the church.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Rev. I. J. Lansing read at the Ministers' Meeting an address entitled, Do the Capitalists Rob or Raise the Laborers? This was one of a series upon the general subject of Work and Wages which Mr. Lansing delivered some years ago. He considered the definitions of the words "capitalist" and "riches," and referred incidentally to the character of those who are usually found declaiming against capital and the wealthy. He affirmed that wealth, by its distribution in the business, personal expenses and benevolences of its possessor, is of great benefit to the laborer, and said that until the ability and talent of men can be regulated by legislation it will be impossible to determine by law the amount of material possessions which they shall have. Wealth is not a supreme good, although the right use of it is a supreme duty, but it is one of the agencies for human welfare which God has intrusted to some men to be used for the good of their brother men.

EXETER.—The two Congregational churches in connection with the Baptist and Methodist have united in a new mission movement at the "west end," the most rapidly growing part of the town and about a mile from all the churches, which gives promise of good results. A new, conveniently located and attractive hall has been secured, with a seating capacity of 250 for the Sunday and such other services and activities as may be deemed necessary for the proper cultivation of the field. The enterprise was formally inaugurated with appropriate and attractive services Oct. 15, with an attendance testing the utmost capacity of the hall. A reading-room will for the present be open two evenings in the week, and will be supplied with such wholesome reading matter as friends of the movement may contribute. Other facilities will be added as there is need and opportunity. The need of some such mission enterprise had long been felt, and the time seemed opportune. BENZONIA.—The church is pleasantly settled down to work. Rev. H. S. Mills is pastor. The college starts out for another year with an enrollment of double that of any previous autumn term. The prospects are brighter than formerly, under President Rodgers.

GREENVILLE.—Last week Sunday the pastor, Rev. A. M. Hyde, preached his annual sermon. In two years 235 persons have joined the church, 208 on confession. The attendance at Y. P. S. C. E. meetings averages 170 and the Sunday school session nearly 300.

CHARLEVOIX.—A young men's club has been organized with a good staff of officers. The club intends to seek the intellectual, moral and spiritual development of the young men of the town. It will also largely interest itself in the Sunday evening services.

BATAVIA.—The State secretary, Dr. W. H. Warren, spent Oct. 18 in this place and baptized 11 persons by immersion and 15 by effusion, and gave the right hand of fellowship to 22. The ingathering is the result of special meetings.

FLINT.—Rev. W. H. Broadhead closed his third year in this pastorate last week Sunday. A special sermon in the morning marked the occasion. The showing for the past year was good in all departments.

LANSING.—Plymouth. A business men's Bible class has just been started for the study of present day topics. It is under the lead of Dr. Edwards of the Agricultural College.

Wisconsin.

RHINELANDER.—Rev. and Mrs. G. C. Haun, who are at the head of the Sunday school missionary work in the State, completed a 12 days' visitation of this region Oct. 26. Preaching services were held in four different schoolhouses and two new Sunday schools were established. Every village not supplied with Protestant services was visited, but in some places organization was impossible. At two places desire was expressed for regular preaching services and Rev. J. H. Chandler will supply them on week nights for the present. An urgent invitation came from a village where not a person was ever previously connected with a Congregational church.

WALWORTH.—Last year a parsonage was built for the occupancy of Rev. M. N. Clark. The membership of the church has increased within four years from 14 to over 50. Mr. Clark preaches every Sunday evening at Fontana, at the head of Geneva Lake, where there is an enthusiastic Y. P. S. C. E. and a fine Sunday school. He is also planning a series of evangelistic services at Williams Bay.

LAKE GENEVA.—This church has a flourishing Boys' Brigade, and is preparing to organize a loyal league of young men with military drill. The young men's Sunday evening club will also be resumed. Rev. C. A. Osborne is acting pastor.

WHITEWATER.—Rev. B. C. Preston has been engaged for one year to assist the pastor, Rev. E. C. Barnard, whose resignation on account of impaired health the church is unwilling to accept.

ELKHORN.—This church is enjoying steady growth. During the three years of the present pastorate the membership has advanced from 160 to 235. The pastor is Rev. G. C. Lochridge.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—Pilgrim. A reception was given, Oct. 26, to Dr. George C. Adams and family, recently of Compton Hill Church.——Compton Hill. A council met, Oct. 22, and concurred in the action of the church accepting the resignation of Rev. George C. Adams, D. D. It will be the policy of the church not to admit any candidates to the pulpit and it is desired that no one apply to the church to become its pastor. Any one who does so apply will at once create a prejudice against himself.—— Central. Rev. C. S. Sargent, D. D., has been chosen chaplain of the regiment composed of the Boys' Brigades of St. Louis.——Fountain Park. Opening services were held in the new edifice Oct. 25. It will be dedicated on Thanksgiving evening.

Iowa.

MONONA.—The pastor, Rev. W. H. Klose, has received a unanimous call to remain the fifth year. He has given an affirmative answer, provided that the church will come to self-support. A vigorous effort is being made to raise the salary on the field.

Rev. R. W. Harris and wife, recently of Bear Grove, are conducting a series of revival meetings with the Southside Church at Red Oak.

Minnesota.

WADENA.—The edifice has been remodeled and enlarged so that it is practically a new building with seating capacity more than doubled. Rev. J. H. Morley preached the dedication sermon and assisted in the raising of money. The cost of the improvements, $2,500, was provided for, the women pledging $250. The church has made substantial progress, and with these improvements takes its place as one of the more important of the State. Rev. J. H. B. Smith is pastor.

Kansas.

PITTSBURG.—Evangelist Veazie closed his series of meetings Oct. 25. He considers it one of the most successful he has held in the State. This town, in which mining and smelting are the chief industries, is worldly and difficult to move religiously, but the interest steadily deepened and the audience increased to crowds. For two weeks he had the efficient assistance of Miss Agnes Fairfield, singer and gospel worker. Among the results are 20 professed adult conversions, 70 persons beginning in some measure a new Christian life, a deep work of grace among 50 children and 12 new members already admitted to the church.

JETMORE AND RUSH CENTER.—After some months of successful labor during the summer at Rush Center Rev. G. H. Hull has now become pastor of both churches, residing at Jetmore. Rush Center, which has counted itself practically extinct, has been remarkably revived, having 22 members, 14 of whom are recent accessions. Much of the good accomplished at the latter point was attained through personal visitation and weekly cottage prayer meetings.

ATHOL.—Thirty-five persons attend the prayer meetings, which are of great interest. Leaders are selected in advance, and during the past six months it has seldom occurred that the same person led the meeting twice. The Sunday school attendance averages 100, and new song-books have recently been purchased. The Ladies' Aid Society furnished funds with which the audience room was recently papered and a bookcase purchased.

KIRWIN.—The Ladies' Missionary Society is flourishing. Pledges of 5, 10 or 15 cents per month for missions are received. There is a program for each meeting and the literature of both the home and foreign boards is in active use. A feature is "talent work," which consists of an entertainment in the line of one's special gifts, musical, literary, etc. The society is supporting a worker in Turkey.

ATCHISON.—The corner stone of the new edifice was recently laid. Rev. Messrs. L. P. Broad and F. D. Altman made addresses. The audience was large and the occasion interesting. Work upon the building is being pushed forward rapidly.

The meetings held in the H. M. tent in September, at a point five miles south of Topeka and convenient to the territory covered by Sunnyside church and two other school districts, have resulted in the erection of a commodious, though inexpensive, board tabernacle near the site where the tent was pitched. Dedicatory services were held Oct. 18, Supt. L. P. Broad preaching the sermon. This is a part of the field of Rev. J. E. Kirkpatrick of Seabrook.

Rev. I. M. Waldrop now has the pastoral care of all the churches on or near the Union Pacific Railway west of Ellis, a distance of 98 miles. There are eight churches and preaching stations, three of which are in the country, requiring long rides by team. On the field are seven Sunday schools, two C. E. Societies and a church membership of nearly 200. Most of this frontier region has no other religious privileges.

Many churches are holding the annual harvest festival in the interest of home missions. This arrangement is proving increasingly popular both as a means of increasing the funds of the C. H. M. S. and of instructing the young concerning H. M. work and needs.

Nebraska.

WEST HAMILTON.—Rev. Edmund Cressman, who closed his work at Doniphan and North Hastings, Aug. 1, has continued to preach at this point. He now removes to Hastings and the church at West Hamilton will unite with the other two in securing a permanent pastor. Five years ago, when Mr. Cressman took charge of this church, it was much discouraged. The membership has now increased from 13 to 44, and there are a flourishing Sunday school and Y. P. S. C. E.

CORTLAND AND PICKRELL.—Rev. F. G. McHenry closed his three years' pastorate with the churches Oct. 25, and will remove at once to South Haven, Mich., where a son-in-law resides. A reception was given Mr. and Mrs. McHenry at Cortland, Oct. 27, and at Pickrell the following Friday evening. These churches will continue to work together, but will not call another pastor until about Jan. 1.

STEELBURG.—Evangelist T. E. Horton is assisting the pastor, Rev. H. H. Avery, in special meetings. This blind preacher is entering upon the third year of his work here.

North Dakota.

CANDO.—Rev. C. A. Mack enters upon a third year as pastor. His salary for the past year has been paid, and the church goes forward with every encouragement. The meeting house is being plastered, and improvements have been made during the year upon the parsonage. The Ladies' Aid Society takes an active interest, and is helping to make the edifice more attractive.

DAWSON AND TAPPAN.—Rev. T. W. Thurston closed a pastorate of six and a half years here Oct. 25. During this time he has done faithful work and the churches have made substantial progress. He removes to Albert Lea, Minn., to reside with a son and will not take up the active work of the ministry again, but may supply occasionally.

DICKINSON.—Rev. G. W. Gallagher, the pastor, has received a call to Barton, Vt., which his many friends here hope he will not accept. The women recently held a fair, netting $167, which has been used in paying off old debts. Under Mr. Gallagher the work has gained strength and the outlook is hopeful.

NEW ENGLAND CITY.—Owing to removals, the membership has become so depleted that it did not seem wise to try to continue the work longer, and the meeting house has been sold by the C. C. B. S. to get back the money they have invested in it.

ABERCROMBIE.—Rev. W. A. Wilkinson has been invited to remain another six months. Under his ministrations the work has gained much. A new organ has been purchased.

MELVILLE.—Under the lead of Pastor Halsall lots are being obtained and a foundation is being put in so a building can be erected early in the spring.

FARGO.—Scandinavian. To the great joy of the workers the H. M. S. has decided to continue aid to this important work, which is prospering finely.

WIMBLEDON.—A determined effort is being made to obtain a parsonage, though the people are poor from loss of crops by hail.

Under the lead of Rev. J. L. Jones the church at Carrington is making good progress. The pastor is occupying the new parsonage.

South Dakota.

WHEELER AND BARTHOLDI.—General Missionary Jenney is spending two weeks on this field, holding special meetings and encouraging the workers.

Supt. C. M. Daley has recently returned from a 10 weeks' missionary trip in the Black Hills and Wyoming in the interest of Sunday school work.

New Mexico.

DEMING.—Rev. N. W. Hankemeyer began work here Sept. 1, and the church, which had been without a minister most of the time for four years, is greatly encouraged. Through the efforts of the Aid Society repairs to the amount of about $100 have been made on the parsonage.

ATRISCO.—Mexican. A bell has been purchased, all but $5 of the cost having been contributed by the people themselves, who, though poor for the most part, have taken an encouraging interest in raising the money.

PACIFIC COAST.

Washington.

The meeting house at Farmington has been recently painted.——The women of the Clayton church have bought stove, lamps, table and chair, and painted the edifice.——Rev. Richard Bushell, on his circuit of eight churches and stations, reaches an average audience of 418.——The offering of Westminster Church, Spokane, to the C. H. M. S. was $100.——Mrs. Tichenor-Bailey is holding services at Green Lake on Sunday evenings.

CANADA.

MONTREAL.—Bethlehem. A new chapel costing, with parsonage, $8,000, was opened Oct. 25, the exercises continuing Nov. 1. A space in front of the chapel is reserved for the edifice proper, which the church hopes to build in a year or two.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW-YORK.

HOW HE DID IT.

You remember the jeweler who bought watches at $3 and sold them at $2 75. People wondered where the profit came from that transaction. But after they had bought one of those watches they understood better. He made his money repairing them.

There is a good deal of a furniture moral in this story. If you want furniture that will last a lifetime, that will minister daily to a hundred conveniences, that will be a continual pleasure and joy, don't expect to buy it at less than its cost.

A good illustration of this is a Sideboard. The Sideboard is easily one of the most important pieces in the whole house. It is the poorest subject for economy. And yet some one must buy the cheap sideboards or they would not be made.

The importance of the Sideboard is our reason for building such a large assortment. You take your choice from over 230 patterns, each one a new design of the present season. And you pay for it the lowest price at which it can be made.

Blood flows in the veins of nearly every one. Scrofula in some form is one of the most common of diseases. Some people inherit the tendency to this affliction, others acquire it in childhood or in later years. But in whatever way it comes, it is a dreaded foe. Scrofula taints in the Manifest themselves in various ways. There is swelling of the glands of the neck, eruptions on the face, and great hideous sores often make their appearance and waste all the vitality of the body, until the health is totally wrecked, and all hope is lost in discouragement and despair. THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

General trade has flattened out for the last week or so, because all attention has been riveted on the political battle. There has been for the past ten days practically no business. Mercantile paper had almost disappeared, and in many centers the banks called in their loans in order to place themselves in as strong a position as possible—strong if free silver should win and equipped to take immediate advantage of opportunities if McKinley wins.

Wheat has advanced in London and that center is a great bull on the cereal for the future. It is thought here that if McKinley is elected the advance movement in wheat will receive a fresh stimulus. But everything is if. If McKinley is elected, wheat, corn, cotton, iron and all the staples will rise, business will be good, mills will start upon full time, and the millions and millions that have been hoarded will come forth.

THE WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The seventeenth annual meeting on Oct. 28 was favored with a fine day. Berkeley Temple was well filled with an audience representing many towns and cities in Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The reports showed excellent results and gave evidence of greater intelligence and earnestness in missionary work.

The address of Mrs. J. D Kingsbury on the Essex North Alliance and the paper by Miss Nathalie Lord gave many suggestions of ways in which individuals and societies can help forward the work of the association.

President McClelland spoke of Pacific University, Forest Grove, Ore., to which the association will contribute during the coming year.

The "question hour," conducted by Mrs J. W. Danielson, aroused much interest. Miss M. B. Means read a searching paper on Why Have Missions a Stronger Hold on Some Christians Than on Others? The address of the president, Mrs. C. L. Goodell, was a timely appeal to Christian women. She suggests that for once we place our Christmas presents in the Lord's treasury. The idea was received with approval and copies of the address were distributed. A large Christmas offering is anticipated. The audience sang a hymn written for the occasion by Katharine Lee Bates, Mrs. Marie Kaula Stone also rendered a beautiful song, and the Jubilee Singers gave three plantation melodies in the afternoon.

Miss M. C. Collins had a message from the Indians. Then Mrs. S. E. Courtney described Cotton Valley, Ala., as she found it and how the people now live after eleven years of teaching and sympathy. It has been a veritable college settlement, quietly and faithfully carried on by a woman whose high character and great ability have made her a Deborah among the people. The association will continue to support the school so well begun, and Mrs. Courtney will be able from her Boston home to use her influence for its advancement.

Rev. Mr. Puddefoot held the great audience to the close with his unique and eloquent descriptions of home missionary life and needs. A generous collection was received, after which President McClelland of Forest Grove University, Ore., offered the closing prayer. Throughout the meeting was successful and the missionary spirit filled the house. Several officers of the Woman's Board of Missions and a number of foreign missionaries were present.

The semi-annual meeting of the association will be held with the Eliot Church, Lowell, April 28.

J. N. HARRIS'S BEQUESTS.

The late J. N. Harris of New London, who was a generous giver in his lifetime, made provision for devoting his property to noble uses after his death. After certain legacies to relatives and friends the following bequests were made:

1. $2,000 to the Bradley Street (city) Mission of New London.
2. $2,000 to the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A.
3. $5,000 each to the American Board and the C. H. M. S.

Also the following:

$500 annually to the Second Congregational Society of New London.
$1,000 annually to the Cedar Grove Cemetery Association.
$2,000 annually to Moody's Mt. Hermon School for Boys.
$1,000 annually to Northfield Seminary.
$1,000 annually to Memorial Hospital, New London.
$250 annually to the Congregational Society of Salem, Ct. (his birthplace).
$200 annually to the Methodist church of New London.

These annuities are to be paid from the income of the Harris Building, a large business building on New London's principal street, which is "left to charitable purposes forever."

Out of the residue of the estate a trust is created which is to continue twenty-one years. This trust is divided into forty-eighths. Twenty-five forty-eighths of the annual income is to be paid each year to Northfield Seminary, the American Board and to the Congregational Home Missionary Society until $10,000 are paid in to each, and after that the income is to go to Mrs. Harris, who is empowered to use it in such ways as she desires. She also has the right to dispose by will or otherwise, at the expiration of the trust, of the principal sum producing these annuities.

One forty-eighth of the annual income is also to be paid to the fund for ministers of the Congregational Church of Connecticut, and another forty-eighth to the New London Conference claimants of the Methodist Church. It is expected that each forty-eighth of the annual income of this part of the estate will amount to $500 at least. Mr. Harris calculated that Mr. Moody's schools would receive at least $100,000 by the time all the bequests are paid. The estate will inventory over a million dollars.

BOSTON SUPERINTENDENTS' UNION.

Ladies night brought its usual large attendance last Monday, the Primary Union of the city being generously represented. The subjects bore particularly upon work for the young. Miss A. M. Gregory occupied a brief time in discussing, with illustrations from life, the dire effects of the increasing use of cigarettes among the young—girls as well as boys—and told something of her efforts to resist the evil in connection with her work in the New England Evangelistic Association. Rev. Lawrence Phelps spoke next of the training needed by the primary teacher, and then Miss M. A. Metcalf, teacher of drawing in the Primary Union, outlined the kindergarten system as applied to primary work, and encouraged its increased adoption. Miss B. F. Vella, always welcome in the union, spoke of the graded system as now largely applied to the younger departments of the Sunday school, and of the greater advantages resulting from that arrangement.

The Damon Instrumental Quartet of young ladies favored the union freely for the second time last night, and their selections were particularly appreciated.

Dr. PARKHURST says: "Mrs. Parkhurst and myself have made use of Pond's Extract so long and so constantly that we can speak appreciatively of it and in terms of warm commendation."

AN OLD SAYING APPLIED.—That old maxim, that the best is the cheapest in the end, applies with special force to the purchase of a sideboard. Of all pieces of furniture the sideboard should claim paramount attention. It ought never to be made the subject of extreme economy. A cheap sideboard is a capital abomination. There is really no excuse for buying a cheap sideboard when the Paine Furniture Co. are selling such superb designs this season at the lowest prices ever quoted in this city. Let none of our readers conclude the purchase of a sideboard without seeing this interesting display.

A. M. A. AFTERMATH.

SOME PUNGENT UTTERANCES AT THE BOSTON JUBILEE.

Men are not to make money, but money is to make men.—Dr. Lyman Abbott.

We may expend for self-culture when it fits us for the highest service.—Dr. Brand.

Law can kill men, but it takes something more than law to give life.—Dr. Gladden.

We are fast learning that it is a disgrace to be rich and not to be a servant.—Dr. Abbott.

The A. M. A. was born of principle and contempt of all compromise.—Rev. R. R. Meredith.

The ranking scholar at Harvard's Medical School recently was the graduate of an A. M. A. school.

It is a very narrow step from prudence to parsimony, from caution to cowardice.—Dr. McKenzie.

Most sacred portion of the human anatomy—the place where we put our pocketbook.—Dr. C. W. Hiatt.

No one has ever heard the Bible except it has been read to him by the Holy Spirit.—Dr. McKenzie.

Arithmetic has been the plague of religion and the source of heresy all the way through.—Dr. McKenzie.

Citizenship for the Indian is a snare unless we make him also a citizen of the kingdom of heaven.—Dr. A. L. Riggs.

We believe in the process of raising Indians, Negroes and poor whites—to a higher plane.—Rev. W. G. Olinger.

We have learned that before there can be applied Christianity there must be Christianity to apply.—Dr. Henry Hopkins.

The three books which the Negro wants to get hold of are the spelling-book, the Bible and the pocketbook.—Dr. Hiatt.

It is too late to question the supremacy of Christ. It is too late to question the power and glory of missions.—Dr. McKenzie.

I love my people, but if their disease is to be cured the medicine must be taken even though it be bitter.—Rev. James Brown.

The A. M. A. has gone into neglected places and taken up even the devil's leavings and made men of them.—Dr. James Brand.

Whoever may "go back to the blanket," to use the expressive Western slang, the Christian Indian does stay put.—Anna L. Dawes.

The school must precede the church for the same reason that John the Baptist preceded Christ—to prepare the way.—Rev. J. R. Savage.

We want young people to take shares in our work, and we will give them dividends of better men and better homes.—Rev. G. W. Moore.

Dr. Brand thinks something needs to be righted when the wealth of the land is increasing seventy-one times faster than the gifts of the churches.

The manly, womanly manner in which social ostracism has been borne bears witness to the kind of material of which the A. M. A. teachers are made.—Dr. L. H. Cobb.

It may be that to the end of time there will be a Black Belt and an Indian Territory, but they will be sovereign states and their inhabitants will be citizens.—Dr. Hopkins.

The Negroes and Indians are our own countrymen. If we have nothing in common with the Indian then why do all our boys take so much pleasure in playing "Indian"? The fact is, we all have a streak of the Indian in us.—Rev. J. H. Twitchell.

A cough, cold or sore throat requires immediate attention. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will invariably give relief.

PALPITATION OF THE HEART.—Winthrop Highlands, Mass., Sept. 27, 1896. "I had a touch of the grip one winter and it left me in a bad condition. I had palpitation of the heart and a sinking feeling at my stomach. I took a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla and it entirely cured me. Since then I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla with benefit for other troubles."—Miss Etta F. Morrill, Cliff Ave.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The American Banker, conjecturing as to where the $600,000 stolen from New Orleans banks by dishonest officials went, says: "It is known that a part of it at least, representing thousands upon thousands of dollars, was squandered upon wine and women."

"Shall I secure an evangelist?" asks an imaginary pastor of the Christian Advocate. "Yes," replies the editor, "if, after meditation upon the whole subject, you feel in the presence of God that you must have assistance, but do not ask for it until by the work of the church and your own efforts a revival has begun and conversions are being made daily; then seek an evangelist noted for the simplicity of his methods, the straightforwardness of his appeals, the common sense and Scripturalness of his instructions; and not one who devotes the first week to teaching the people how to produce spectacular effects and to prepare the community at the critical period to shut up all their places of business, and then to make a powerful impression by showing what a marvelous display of the divine Spirit that must be which produces such a spontaneous surrender on the part of the people of their worldly proceeds in order to give the word of God free course to run and be glorified."

ABROAD.

The Yui-itsu, the Shinto organ of Japan, says that the treatment of the American Board by the Doshisha has been unfilial and un-Christian, but its other comments on the situation reveal that its judgment on this point is the offspring of jealousy and hatred, correct though its decision on that especial point may be.

The editor of the Japan Mail, after surveying the situation in the East and analyzing the policy of Russia in China and Korea, says in conclusion: "Russia and Great Britain may be compared to two huge glaciers moving slowly but surely forward. Unless one of them be disintegrated en route their ultimate collision is inevitable."

Rev. Dr. John Henry Barrows, in a letter from Göttingen summing up his impressions of Germany, says in The Chicago Record: "The sense of individual responsibility, of which we make so much in America and to which we appeal in the Christian life, is not so keen and potent in German Christendom. The fundamental and all-pervading trouble here in every department of life is that the people are governed. They wait for those who are placed over them, and depend on having things done for them. The elements wherein America and England are, as I think, superior to Germany have come directly or indirectly from Puritanism, by which I mean the grand spiritual discipline which has blessed English-speaking peoples for the last 250 years. Puritanism has dethroned kings, or taken from them all but the semblance of power, has developed personal responsibility, and hence manhood and womanhood, has exalted the individual above the state and has inspired, as nowhere else, the love of universal humanity."

Die Nation (German Liberal organ) recently contained the following editorial comment on our political campaign: "The present campaign has not only an incalculable economic bearing, but also its purely political significance cannot be overestimated. If it is true that a people like the American, which has been trained in democratic self-government for more than a hundred years, is not able to withstand so obvious a temptation; if it should prove itself so inexperienced as, in a mad hallucination, to destroy with its own hands the foundation of its entire prosperity—then the whole democratic form of government would thereby be most fatally discredited; all the reactionary parties in the world would begin to prove, in view of the dire consequences of such a blunder of popular sovereignty, that the general welfare of the state requires that the great masses of the people be deprived of the right of deciding their own political destinies and that the public good be intrusted to stable authorities."

John M. McCandlish, in the Free Church of Scotland Monthly, writing on the subject of Free Church Finance, points out the interesting fact that "in England and Scotland the stipends of the clergy of the Established churches depend for their amount on the current prices of agricultural produce, and these prices have very materially diminished of late years. Thus the average selling price in Edinburgh of the three principal kinds of grain—wheat, oats and barley—is now thirty per cent. less than it was in 1843. The consequent decrease in the amount of the stipends payable to the ministers of the Established Church, which in England is said to be forty per cent., and is the subject of a very grievous outcry, has in Scotland been partly compensated by the application of the unexhausted teinds." [A teind is that part of the estate of a Scotch layman which is liable to be assessed for the stipend of the clergy of the Established Church. —EDS]

The students of Glasgow University have nominated Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain as candidate for the lord rectorship of that institution.

THE second summer, many mothers believe, is the most precarious in a child's life; generally it may be true, but you will find that mothers and physicians familiar with the value of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk do not so regard it.

WHAT BETTER PROOF?—We have actually received more than ten thousand voluntary letters from those who have been cured of some form of throat and lung trouble by Adamson's Botanic Cough Balsam. Think what a tribute of appreciation this is. Sold by your local druggist.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, OCT. 30.

Miss Atkinson presided, and, after reading 1 John 1, spoke of fellowship with Christ and Christian fellowship with one another. Dr. Ray Palmer's hymn,

Jesus, these eyes have never seen
That radiant form of thine, was sung, which prompted Mrs. Thompson to speak of the relation between the disciple of today and his divine Master as compared with John's relation to him, showing that the disciple of today may be quite as near his Lord as John ever was, receiving just as much sympathy and help.

Mrs. Schneider reported an interview with a number of Armenian refugees who had just arrived in Boston, among whom she found some of her old Gedik Pasha pupils, and read extracts from a letter received from Mrs. Dr. Washburn of Constantinople, in which she speaks of the "terrible revelation of the forces in the midst of which we live"; over forty thousand are said to have left Constantinople, including Greeks as well as Armenians. One man from Egin said his friends were "all gone." Mrs. Schneider also spoke of Miss Gleason's recent experiences at Hasskeuy and of the condition of affairs in Aintab. Miss Stone, whose word from Bulgaria is always listened to with interest, said that Armenians are flocking to that country in pursuit of the freedom which that nation has enjoyed for the last eighteen years. Among Bulgarians there is intense national feeling, and they greatly need the prayers of Christians that they may make the best use of their new opportunities.

Miss Emily Wheeler reported the latest news from Egin that according to the estimate 2,000 were killed in the recent massacre, whole families being blotted out, and that out of 1 800 houses only 100 are left. The calendar call during the week for special prayer for the workers at Van was not forgotten. Dr. Raynolds was the only missionary there during the late massacre, and no details have as yet been received. Mrs. Raynolds is in Ooroomiah, where she went some months ago, accompanied by Mrs. Allen, who is now on her homeward journey. Miss Fraser and Miss Huntington are in Europe, and the latter has accepted an invitation to San Sebastian for the winter, where she will take charge of the kindergarten work in connection with Mrs. Gulick's school. Dr. Grace N. Kimball has returned to this country and is assistant resident physician at Vassar College.

When Professor Felix Klein of Göttingen was at Princeton's celebration, twenty-seven men with degrees from Göttingen, now resident in and near Philadelphia, gave him a dinner.

Some one found at the A. M. A. jubilee a memorial ring, evidently of value to the loser. Its owner can obtain it from Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., Shawmut Church, Boston.

MRS. LOUISA HUNT SAFFORD.

Died of paralysis, in Sioux City, Io., Oct. 8, Mrs. Safford, widow of Stephen F. Safford formerly of New Ipswich, N. H. She was born in Peterboro, N. H., Oct. 11, 1812 Married in 1836, she came to Illinois and lived, first at Quincy and later at Hamilton, for thirty-five years. Since January, 1891, her home has been at Sioux City, Io., with her daughter, Rev. Mary A. Safford. She sleeps in Jesus.

MRS. JOHN WOODS.

Mrs. Woods died in Minneapolis, Minn., at the residence of her son, Charles H. Woods, Esq., Sunday, Nov. 1, aged ninety-six years and two months. Mrs. Woods was the wife of Rev. John Woods, many years pastor in Warner and Newport, N. H She survived him twenty years. Until stricken with pneumonia a few days ago, Mrs. Woods was in full possession of her faculties, kept up an active interest in all the work of the denomination and was a constant attendant at Plymouth Church and prayer meeting, frequently going alone. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

DEACON ELIAS T. FISHER.

Deacon Fisher was born March 25, 1814, in that part of Holliston which afterwards was joined to Medway. He died Sept. 11, 1896, in West Medway where from boyhood his life was spent. In youth he joined the Second Congregational Church, to which he gave willing and valuable service for over half a century—a part of the time as deacon. On the formation of the Third Church he was elected its deacon and died in that office.

He was a man of equable and quiet disposition, courteous and genial in deportment, unswerving in principle, heartily identified with every good work, respected and beloved by all. He served his town in the offices of school committee and assessor several years.

A lingering sickness, patiently endured, brought him to the end of life and to the rest of God's saints. A wife and six children survive him. R. K. H.

REV. LINCOLN HARLOW

Died in Post Mills, Vt., Oct. 9. He was born in Turner, Me., May 7, 1838, and graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1863. He soon went to Lewis, Io., and has besides held pastorates in Kansas, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York and Vermont. On account of his health he was about to close his work at Post Mills and W. Fairlee, Vt., when he was suddenly called home. Never of firm health, he has labored almost continuously, seeking no other relief than that which might come from change of place. His has been a quiet and fruitful ministry, and he leaves behind the blessed memories of a work well done. His wife, son and daughter are left to mourn his loss and rejoice in the memory of a life which has been triumphantly Christian. C. L. G.

REV. ROBERT CRAWFORD, D. D.,

Was born at Paisley, Scotland, Nov. 24, 1804. He entered peacefully into rest under the loving care of his only surviving daughter and her husband, Rev. Thomas A. Emerson, at Clinton, Ct., Oct. 26, 1896.

He came with his parents to Canada in 1821, and made his way to the United States in 1826, working in cotton mills at Hoosic Falls, N. Y., and Bennington, Vt. On his conversion he felt drawn, and was urged by friends, to enter the ministry. He had now come to be twenty eight years of age, but, having no taste for short cuts, he entered Williams College and was graduated in the Class of 1836, getting his theological training partly at Princeton but chiefly at Union. With the exception of a brief episode near Philadelphia in 1856, Dr. Crawford's ministry was devoted to two parishes, North Adams, 1840 to 1855, Deerfield, January, 1858, to the day of his death, twenty-five years as pastor, the remaining time as pastor emeritus. He retained a vital interest in both parishes, and his memory is tenderly cherished in both. From 1840 to 1881 he enjoyed the sweet fellowship and valuable assistance of his tenderly loved wife, a daughter of Rev. Dr. Griffin, president of Williams College. Three children survive him: the daughter with whom he spent the last four years, a son who was for more than twenty years instructor in history in the University of Illinois, and Rev. Lyndon S. Crawford, a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M., who, instead of taking the vacation which would properly fall to him this year, chooses to stay at his laborious and dangerous post in Trebizond, Turkey.

Dr. Crawford retired to a remarkable degree to the very end of his ninety two years of life his physical and mental powers, and an active interest in present day affairs. "He never came into the house without bringing sunshine," said a neighbor; and emphatic testimony was borne at the funeral to the kindliness and value of his fatherly counsels to younger ministers. He performed his various tasks with cheerful fidelity, and bore the pains and trials that fell to his lot with loyal submission. A unique feature of the funeral services was the presence and testimony of Rev. J. J. Dana of Housatonic, Mass., who had exchanged weekly letters with Dr. Crawford ever since they parted at North Adams more than forty years ago. Twenty-five years ago they promised each other that when either died the survivor would, if possible, attend his funeral. This promise Mr. Dana, though eighty-five years of age, remembered and kept, and he spoke of Dr. Crawford much as David spoke of Jonathan.

From the Master whom he served so faithfully through so many years Dr. Crawford has doubtless heard ere this the welcome "Well done." A. S.

THE ABOVE CUT SHOWS EXACT SIZE AND PATTERN OF SPOONS.

These are the Original World's Fair Souvenir Teaspoons. Every visitor to the Fair knows that the price of these spoons on the Fair grounds was $1.50 apiece, or $9.00 for a set of six, or $18.00 for the entire collection of twelve different spoons, and here we sell you a set of six for only 99 cents.

Can You Afford to Miss It?

The spoons are divided into two different sets as follows: Set No. 4 comprises these six buildings—Manufacturers, Horticultural, Woman's, Fisheries, Machinery Hall, Transportation. Set No. 5 comprises these six—Administration, Art, Agriculture, Electrical, Mining, Government.

You can have either set you like, but under no circumstances will less than a set of six be sold, nor will they be divided in any other manner than above. Bear in mind that these are not cheap, washed-over spoons, but genuine triple plate silver on white metal, stamped LEONARD MFG. CO., Al—a guarantee of reliability. They are FULL SIZE for table use, and the entire bowl outside and inside is gold-plated, showing a beautifully engraved and embossed building of the Fair. The set of six is put up in a handsomely lined box and is sent by mail PREPAID ON RECEIPT OF PRICE, 99 CENTS.

REV. ALONZO H. QUINT, D. D.
Born March 22, 1828; died Nov. 4, 1896.

DO they not tell of some Eastern custom wherein one desirous of testing the future lighted a taper and fixed it upon a little support, which in the night should float down a slowly moving stream? And if the light was still burning when the taper passed around some distant point of land in the river which must hide it from sight then the prophecy was full of joy. What does that land point signify, beyond which sight cannot penetrate, but into which the light may pass unquenched and steady?—Dr. Quint, in an article entitled Sealed Orders, in The Congregationalist of June 14, 1894.

"The special characteristics of Dr. Van Dyke's treatmet t are three: intense modernity—a recognition of the actual present as affecting questions which are as old as Christianity; intense personality—not the intrusion of his own, but the quick recognition of the fact that these are not abstract topics, but questions vitally personal to every reader.—*The Evangelist, N. "The usefulness and value of this series is well shown in the skillful editing and helpful presentation of this particular book of the Bible."—The Congregationalist, Boston.

"We welcome the new series most heartily, since, notwithstanding it 'doesnot touch matters of devotion and theology,' it strips the Books of Wisdom of their 'mediæval and anti-literary form by which our current Bible allows them to be obscured,' and thus makes their wonderful ethical insight all the more appreciable."—Biblical World.

"It may almost be said that he (Professor Moulton) has inaugurated a new epoch in Bible study. The scholars have been telling us for some years that the Bible is literature Particular passages of beauty in it have been pointed out, and some single books, such as Job and the Song of Songs, have been put in literary form and given a literary interpretation by special writers. But Professor Moulton is the first one, so far as I know, to deal with the whole Bible as a collection of literature, to discriminate between literary study and historico-critical study, and to present the results of the former in such a form as to render them available to the ordinary English reader."—Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott.

COMPANION BOOK TO "TITUS."

THE WRESTLER OF PHILIPPI

BY THE EMINENT STORY-WRITER, FANNIE E. NEWBERRY.

A tale of the times of the early followers of Jesus, and how they lived the "Christ-life" in the first century. As "Titus" gave the reader a picture of the life and times of Christ, so this book is intended to prortray the life and times of the early Church.

Everybody Will Read It. The plot is a fascinating one. It is a story for both boys and girls, young and old. Its Oriental setting, with its descriptions of quaint customs, manners, beliefs, etc., gives it a freshness and attractiveness all its own. It is the work of many months of careful thought and study.

Sunday School Lessons. For the year 1897 our Sunday-school lessons are in the Acts and Epistles, and all are about the early Church. To study these lessons after having read this book will be a pleasure. It gives an insight into the manners and customs, political, moral and spiritual life of those times.

Price, 5 Cents. The book has ninety-six large pages, and is finely illustrated. The cover is of heavy enameled paper, and printed in colors. Price, 5 cents per copy, postpaid, in any quantity desired. Sent on receipt of price to any address.

It was an immediate success, nearly a million copies having been sold.

TO the circle of workers in the office of The Congregationalist the death of Dr. Quint brings a sense of loss and loneliness comparable only to that felt when Dr. Dexter and Mr. Richardson were so suddenly taken away within two months of each other, six years ago. Dr. Quint has written hundreds of articles for the paper, beginning before the war, continuing in the remarkable series of letters from the front and making his connection still more intimate in later years through an understanding that he should furnish two signed articles every month. This arrangement has been in force most of the time during the past six or eight years, and all classes of our readers have found them interesting and profitable. In addition to his signed articles he was a frequent contributor to the editorial columns. The last editorial which he wrote was the estimate of Professor Blaisdell, which we printed Oct. 22. He was in the habit of visiting this office almost daily, and his counsel and suggestions on many subjects were eagerly sought and highly prized. It was here that the great friendliness of the man revealed itself in quiet and beautiful ways, the memory of which will never fade. In future issues we shall call to mind some of these personal characteristics, but here we would place on record our deep sense of gratitude for a life that came near us always to bless and to uplift, and to make us more sure of the realities of the Christian faith, under the inspiration of which he lived and died.

The denomination is glad to have a new church so strategically placed as the Leyden, which was organized under such happy auspices at Brookline last week. There has not been for many years, in this vicinity, a better opportunity for building up within a moderately short period a self-sustaining and widely influential Congregational church. The fact that it devoted its first benevolent offering, last Sunday, to the American Board shows that it intends from the start to live not unto itself. The further fact that at its first Friday evening prayer meeting after formal organization eighteen of the nineteen male members were present indicates the earnestness of the devotion behind the movement. This field has for years invited the denomination, and it is not more reasonable to expect Congregationalists living in that part of Brookline to attend church in town than it would be to ask the supporters of Harvard Church, Brookline, or the Second Church, Dorchester, to abandon those thriving and useful centers of worship and work in order to contribute the money involved in sustaining them to the support of Berkeley Temple or of Park Street Church. New churches will continue to grow up in our prosperous suburbs in the future as they have in the past. They are the result of the working of laws and impulses which cannot and ought not to be reversed. The only question for the denomination to decide is whether it will be first, second or last in these promising fields.

Recognition of the inevitable drift from the city to the suburbs ought not, however, to blind us to its effect upon the churches thus depleted. The generous spirit evinced by Dr. Barton of Shawmut Church and Dr. Dickinson of Berkeley Temple in yielding up to the Leyden Church men and women upon whom they have long relied cannot be too highly praised. Yet notwithstanding the hearty Godspeed which they have extended to their departing members the hearts of these pastors can hardly fail to be saddened by such withdrawals. But this is precisely what the pastors of East Boston, South Boston and Charlestown have been forced to endure year after year as they have seen one after another of the choicest of their flocks migrating to Dorchester, Roxbury, Brookline and the Newtons. We sometimes wonder to what extent these brethren who have changed their places of residence still consider the welfare of the churches in which they were reared. How much it might mean to those who are bravely sustaining these posts in the face of great obstacles if the financial strength, business sagacity and Christian consecration of their former associates could be made available in a tangible form.

To the effort now making to rebuild Mt. Holyoke College the exercises of Founder's Day, last week Thursday, will contribute a powerful impulse. Despite the severe storm friends and graduates from near and far rallied at South Hadley in good numbers. The services of the day, in which Pres. G. Stanley Hall, Dr. Judson Smith, Mrs. Moses Smith and Mrs. Edwin Atwell, president of the New York Alumnæ Association, participated, were permeated with a spirit of buoyant hopefulness. Already there is much to justify a good degree of confidence. The trustees have decided to erect at once an administration building and two houses, each of which will accommodate perhaps fifty students. As funds come into view other houses will be erected —all of them to be known as halls—until provision has been made for the 400 students. This method of housing them differs materially from the old plan of gathering them under one roof, but it is a change which will be generally commended. Added interest was given to the occasion last week by the formal laying of the corner stone of the new Mary Brigham Hall. This structure was planned for long before the recent fire, and represents the generosity of Dr. Pearsons and New York and Brooklyn graduates of the college, who desired to provide a permanent memorial of Miss Brigham, so suddenly snatched away just as she was entering upon the duties of president.

The study of the Bible as literature is as yet comparatively in its infancy. It is certain to command increasing popular attention. It will depend upon pastors to decide whether they shall guide this study or leave it to men less in sympathy with the divine purpose. We believe that wise ministers will qualify themselves for this work, and so undertake it as to secure the reverent interpretation by the people of the Holy Scriptures in the light of recent scholarship. The Old South Church in Boston did a notable service in this direction last winter by providing a course of Sunday evening lectures on the history of Israel, given by Biblical scholars. Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott proposes to give a series of fourteen lectures in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, of which he is pastor. The first of these was delivered last Sunday evening. They are to be followed by conferences in the lecture-room of the church, and Dr. Abbott invites questions and suggestions on the topics treated, either at the conferences or by letter. He does not propose to discuss questions of date or authorship and he will avoid controversy. His purpose is to set before his people results which may be regarded as settled. The time is opportune for many pastors to follow his example.

A Roman Catholic church edifice at West Point would be offensive to the large majority of the people and, we believe, would be contrary to law. The property of the Federal Government certainly ought not to be appropriated to sectarian purposes. The chief officer at West Point has power to issue licenses for temporary structures on the ground. But a stone church is not a temporary structure. We hope the Secretary of War will refuse a license for this manifestly improper use of Government property, and thus avoid an uprising of the people to protest against it. It is by such intrusions as this, which an ordinary sense of propriety withholds other denominations from attempting, that the Roman Catholic Church does much to encourage the strong prejudice of many—of which it complains—against its right to exist in this country.

It would seem that the intellectual and spiritual vigor and consequent popularity of men like Dr. Storrs ought forever to set at rest the misconception that only young men are good for the ministry. In all other departments of life experience and judgment are valued at their true worth, and the more critical the case the maturer the expert called in. In the ministerial realm alone are youth and inexperience at so high a premium that too often a young man blights his prospects for later life when he enters it. Brethren, these things ought not so to be. Part of the responsibility rests with the preacher. A due regard for the laws of health, a mind ever open to fresh thought and new truth—the relish for which should only grow keener as time goes on—a heart responsive to the claims of humanity ought to render a pastor increasingly welcome to all who desire the sincere milk of the Word and whose tastes have not been vitiated by artificial substitutes therefor.

A papyrus has lately been discovered in Egypt, giving an account of a suit against Herod Agrippa brought before the emperor of Rome by two leading anti-Semites of Alexandria. That helps to make more real the suit brought before the emperor of Rome against Paul by Portius Festus, in which Herod Agrippa figured. We shall study about it in our Sunday schools next year.

A GREAT LEADER CALLED HOME.

In the official records of Congregationalism for the last forty years no names appear so often as those of Henry M. Dexter and Alonzo H. Quint. They were acknowledged to be without rivals as authorities in Congregational history and as interpreters of Congregational policy. Since the death of Dr. Dexter, six years ago, Dr. Quint has been the Nestor of our denomination. He had been an enthusiastic student of its history from the beginning of his ministry. He early apprehended its possibilities. He did heroic service in awakening Congregational churches to a denominational consciousness, in persuading them that they had a mission to the whole nation as well as to New England, and in giving practical direction to their awakening energies.

He did not originate Congregational statistics, but he elaborated and systematized them. For a quarter of a century he was secretary of the Massachusetts General Association, the largest and most influential body of Congregational churches in the United States. For seventeen years he was an editor and a proprietor of the Congregational Quarterly from its beginning in 1859, and in its pages discussed new aims and enlarged work for the denomination. Out of it grew the Year-Book, which was largely his conception and creation. He was among the foremost in advocating and planning for the National Council of 1865 and was the chairman of its business committee. He and Dr. Leonard Bacon framed the platform of Congregational polity adopted by the council. He also wrote a part of what is now known as the Burial Hill Declaration of Faith put forth by that body. These were the first statements of doctrine and polity adopted by representatives of all the churches for more than two centuries. When in 1871 the National Council of Congregational Churches became a permanent organization, Dr. Quint drafted its constitution, and he has been elected a delegate to every subsequent triennial council. He was the only person possessing that honor. In every meeting he has been a prominent leader. Among the many services he rendered under the appointment of successive councils, one of the most valuable was as chairman of the committee to prepare a Council Manual, which was published a few weeks before his death.

For more than a quarter of a century his advice has been sought as an exponent of Congregational polity in all sorts of questions which perplexed the churches; and in recent years, since he has been without a pastorate, his time has been largely occupied by these affairs. His rare memory, his experience as a legislator, his knowledge of ecclesiastical law, his judicial mind and his great kindness of heart made him an ideal counselor.

He refused to grow old. Strongly attached to the friends of his own age, yet, as one by one they passed on beyond, he generously gave his friendship to younger men and claimed theirs with a comradeship which was irresistible. He looked forward with unabated interest to the developments of coming years in religious and national life, even after he became convinced that he would not share in them. To his latest day on earth his life was full, and his share was large in present affairs.

The extent of his gratuitous service to the public will not be fully known till the lack of it comes to be felt. The Board of Ministerial Aid, the Congregational Library, the new denominational headquarters whose plans he was carefully studying, the interests of Dartmouth College and of Andover Seminary, of whose official boards he was a member, were only a part of the burdens he constantly carried.

Few knew how frail a hold he had on life, because he seldom complained of his physical infirmities. With greatly impaired eyesight and with a disease of the heart, which he knew might at any moment bring him to the end of life, he accomplished an amount of work which would have absorbed the energies of one in full health. He sustained a kind of pastoral relation to many churches in Boston and vicinity with which he had labored, and he rendered many unostentatious ministries to the sick, the bereaved and burdened which will never be recorded. He had a vital and always fresh interest in human life and an instinctive eagerness to uplift and beautify it, and many a token of regard he has had from strangers whom he has counted as his friends. His relations with The Congregationalist were close and constant. The last article which we published under his name was in the issue of Oct. 8, entitled The Policeman at the Crossing. Above his coffin at the funeral service last Friday morning drooped the banners of the State of Massachusetts and of his associates in arms. The flag of his country, which he had served on battle-fields, covered his body, together with a wealth of chrysanthemums and evergreens which witnessed to the affection of many hearts. But perhaps none of these tributes to his memory would have pleased him more than the wreath of flowers sent by "the policeman at the crossing."

A soldier, a statesman, a theologian, a patriot, above all a minister of Jesus Christ, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, he has passed into the eternal rest of the people of God. But the place he has left vacant is a large one—and it cannot be filled.

SAVE THE ARMENIAN ORPHANS.

To be able to do one thing toward mitigating the awful horrors attending the massacres of Armenian Christians furnishes some relief for hearts appalled by the series of crimes that for more than a year have been the shame and sorrow of the civilized world. We all have been beseeching our own Government, and through it the more responsible European Powers, to bring, if possible, the terrible tragedy to an end. Some of us have contributed, according to our means, to relief funds, and yet the situation seems blacker than at any time since "the great assassin of Europe" inaugurated his policy of extermination. The danger now is that we shall grow callous or despairing and say, "It's of no use. The Powers will not act decisively and the little I can give is like trying to stop an onrushing stream with a pebble."

But have we here in America, we Christians whose missionary interests in Asia Minor are at stake, done all that we can do? We answer no, and wish to point out a specific and immediate line of action. It will not solve the whole problem, to be sure, but it will, if general co-operation ensues, have important and far-reaching beneficent results.

Last week the Prudential Committee of the American Board authorized its missionaries in Turkey to take charge of the work of administering funds which may be sent them for the relief of the thousands of children whom the massacres have made orphans and homeless. The committee was led to this step through appeals from the field, which set forth the awful plight of these children and the unparalleled opportunity for obtaining an influence over their young lives through provision for them in this the season of their extremity. The sword of the assassin has spared most of the children under ten years of age, but left without parental care they are starving and dying. Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, to whose words in another column we invite special attention, received the other day a letter from Turkey in which the writer said, "Another massacre would almost be a merciful dispensation in view of the present destitution of these little ones." A conservative estimate places their number at not less than 20,000. The relief funds, although excellently administered, have not to any extent met their need. The Ottoman Government opposes their removal from the devastated regions. If it undertakes at all to provide for them it will do so only with a view to proselyting the boys and to training the girls for Turkish harems. This was its policy in Bulgaria.

But what if thousands or even hundreds of these miserable little ones could be provided with shelter and clothes and food, could be gathered by groups into available buildings, their support for a year being assured, and the opportunity of a Christian education being made available to them? Aside from fulfilling toward these needy ones the obligations of our common humanity, we have an unprecedented chance to push forward the work of foreign missions. Evangelize these children and the character of the next generation of the Armenian population of Turkey is assured. Neglect them and the work of Christian missions in Turkey will lag for the next fifty years, while many of the glorious results of the last half-century will be largely undone.

The precise method by which this kind of relief work may be administered has already been thought out by the Board's officials. What we urge here is a realization on the part of every one who reads these lines of his peculiar privilege of doing something simple, direct, immediate to help heal the world's open sore.

Thanksgiving and Christmas are close upon us with all their blessed suggestion of God's goodness to us, and of our duty to minister to Christ's little ones as he has ministered unto us. How can we enter with any measure of gladness into these festivals unless our hearts have gone out toward those in Armenia who have been so severely bruised and bereaved? We do not ask for large gifts only. We think there may be many among our readers from whom only a small offering is possible, and that only through self-denial, but to all who are benevolent in spirit we extend the opportunity of having a share in this Armenian Orphans' Fund. If $1,000 or $5,000 or a greater sum can be raised before Christmas it will, intrusted to our careful missionaries go a great way, and as all moneys can be forwarded by cable the gifts will be almost immediately operative in the region scourged by famine and the sword. The moneys will be transmitted without expense and every cent will go to the object for which it is given. In order that it may be seen just what disposition can be made of specific gifts, we give herewith some idea of the relief power that inheres in them:

Ten dollars will provide home, clothing and food for one orphan for five months or until the trying winter is over.

Five dollars will house and clothe one orphan for a year.

Three dollars will house one orphan for a year.

One dollar will house, clothe and feed one orphan for two weeks.

We shall acknowledge from week to week the sums contributed. The Congregationalist starts this fund by taking five ten dollar shares. All letters should be addressed to The Armenian Orphans' Fund, care The Congregationalist.

THE VERDICT OF THE PEOPLE.

The whole country breathed a sigh of relief when the result of last week's election became known. This generation has never before taken part in a presidential contest which was felt to involve so largely the welfare of every citizen. The decisive verdict rendered at the polls has given a new impulse to trade throughout the world. It has increased the confidence of all civilized nations in the American people. What use shall we make of the vantage ground gained at cost of so great a struggle?

This incoming administration ought to be as unpartisan as is possible. Mr. McKinley is not made president by the Republican party. It is almost certain that he would have failed of election if Democratic political leaders had not worked for him, and if Democrats in the States which decided the result had not voted for him by thousands. A large number of voters who opposed the parties supporting Mr. Bryan believed that there were wrongs to be redressed, of some of which those parties took cognizance. They voted the Republican ticket because they thought the methods proposed by Mr. Bryan's supporters would create worse evils than those they sought to remedy or avert. The support of the new administration by these voters will depend on the sincerity and ability with which it seeks the best interests of every party and of every section. If the next administration is organized on party lines it will be a failure. If it is made a government for all the people it may be a brilliant success. There never was a more inviting opportunity than now to bring the entire nation into closer union, and there was never a time when such a work was more needed. The official appointments and the policy to be outlined within the next few months will decide what the government is to be.

The people expect that men will be chosen for the Cabinet and as leaders of the national legislature who will work in harmony, but they desire that these men shall also represent all sections of the country and all the interests of the nation. The people are ready to make such concessions as may be necessary to secure united support of the administration, though not for the advantage of a party or a class, but only for the general good. They want a tariff which will provide amply for the necessities of the Government and for the reasonable protection of its industries and of wage-earners. They do not want a tariff which aims to strengthen trusts, to foster monopolies and which will make it harder for the honest poor in any part of the land to earn a living. They want the money of the United States to be equally good with that of other nations; but they recognize the fact that great problems of finance press for settlement and that these problems require the highest wisdom of expert financiers acting independently of political party relations.

The issues which divided the South from the North have completely passed away. The majority of the voters in the last election were not yet born when the Civil War began. Probably less than ten per cent. of those who voted last week were old enough in 1860 to take part in the election of that year. The people do not favor efforts to revive those issues, or to perpetuate those vanishing dividing lines on any other issues. Nor will they take kindly to proposals to unite the South and West against the Eastern and Interior States to keep up party warfare now that the contest has been decided. Mr. Bryan's congratulations to his successful opponent were graceful and manly. His manifesto to his followers, urging them to continue the warfare along the same lines, looking to the next presidential election, was ill-timed and unstatesmanlike. There is more important business on hand for all citizens than getting ready for the next election. Before that shall come we have four years' work before us to secure the greatest possible good out of the election just concluded.

We believe it is the purpose of the president-elect and his counselors to make the new administration represent the whole country and all classes in it. Already new hope is kindled, new confidence manifested. Business is springing up, which will benefit all the people. A wise administration of government, neither partisan nor sectional, and a reasonable confidence in our rulers will bring in an era of good feeling which has not been realized since the country became divided on the slavery question, more than forty years ago. No burning questions are now before us which need array one section or one class against another. Our greatest interests and aims are common to all the nation. Our greatest problems are such that they cannot be settled by popular dispute and party contest, but only by careful study and wise, cautious non-partisan legislation. Who can measure the national greatness and prosperity which are certain to follow an era of good feeling throughout the whole land? To foster it is the citizen's privilege, the Christian's duty, the Administration's opportunity. Every true patriot will accept the verdict of the people and seek to gain through it the highest prosperity for our country.

THE HALF-CENTURY PASTORATE OF DR. STORRS.

Richard Salter Storrs, the son of a minister, a graduate of Yale College, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Longmeadow, Mass., Dec. 7, 1785. He continued in that office nearly thirty-four years, till he died, Oct. 3, 1819. His son, Richard Salter Storrs, second, a graduate of Williams College and of the first class in Andover Theological Seminary, was ordained in the Congregational church, Braintree, Mass., and remained its pastor more than sixty-two years, till his death, Aug. 11, 1873. Richard Salter Storrs, third, a graduate of Amherst College and Andover Seminary, was ordained in Brookline, Mass., Oct. 22, 1845. The following year he became pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y. Next week he will have completed a service of fifty years in that office.

This record is without a parallel in American history. These three ministers, bearing the same name, born in New England and educated in her institutions, have preached the gospel in Congregational churches during almost the entire period of our national life, and their aggregate service in three pulpits is 146 years. Without interruption or abatement this service has been conspicuous, distinguished and of commanding confidence. It has proclaimed unfalteringly Jesus Christ as God manifest in the flesh, the Saviour and Lord of mankind. This remarkable succession has been maintained with augmenting brilliancy and influence by him who now bears this honorable name. As preacher, editor, author, citizen, orator, Dr. Storrs has continuously held the attention of religious leaders, of scholars and of men of affairs. His words have carried great weight in some of the most important decisions of our religious and national life. As the head of one of the foremost foreign missionary enterprises in the world, his interest in other nations, his wisdom and his affection for missionary laborers have made themselves felt in shaping the future of great empires whose influence is to be immeasurable.

In grateful remembrance and loving fellowship the friends and associates of Dr. Storrs will celebrate with him his jubilee anniversary. Such a celebration is peculiarly fitting, for with generous affluence he has made his life and service theirs also, radiating from one center for half a century. The Church of the Pilgrims is what Dr. Storrs has made it. He has molded the characters and directed the aspirations of two generations of its members, hundreds of whom have gone forth to live in other towns and cities, some in distant countries. But whatever other affiliations they have formed, they still compose one church, and their work and influence are one. He once said of it: "This church has its personal consciousness. A certain invisible spiritual force associates its members, selects its aims, directs its conclusions, prompts or limits its organized action." "Its strength is inherent, not adventitious; and its history is prophetic." Its character not less appears in him. As he acknowledged, "Its influence on the pastor is as definite and positive as his upon it." This jubilee belongs to both church and pastor, and their lives are inextricably interwoven.

Together also during this long period they have guided and uplifted the people among whom they have lived. They will read over again next week what they have written on the city whose marvelous growth hardly finds a parallel even in the wonderful development of our Western States. The Church of the Pilgrims and its pastor have placed their ministering imprint on highways and parks in Brooklyn, on schools and colleges, hospitals and homes for the needy, on libraries and institutions to promote the knowledge of history, literature, music and art. From a new unformed community of less than 60,000, a magnificent city of more than a million inhabitants has been developed within these fifty years and no single factors in it have been more potent for good than this church and its pastor.

During this same period the membership of Congregational churches in the United States has been increased more than threefold. The doctrine and polity of the denomination have passed through remarkable changes. Who has more rejoiced in its progress or has more loyally held it true to its principles than Dr. Storrs, with his profound knowledge of Puritan history and his masterly eloquence in its defense inspired by the inherited Puritan spirit always alive in him and, on occasions, flaming forth in magnificent exposition and eulogy? In the great work of missions Dr. Storrs has led the denomination through stormy seas of debate and dispute, never losing sight of their purpose nor suffering the Master's command to be unheard till, with perils past, we are again united in the effort to bring the world to Christ. He has long been, beyond the bounds of his denomination, his city or State, one of the most foremost citizens of the republic. A few years ago an eminent critic said of him that "as orator for occasions of an elevated character he is perhaps as near as any living American to being now the elect favorite voice of the nation."

At seventy-five years of age the pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims continues to labor with a scarcely lessened physical vigor and with undiminished intellectual power. Those who heard his uplifting address at Toledo last month felt that his eye was undimmed and his strength unabated. Dr. Storrs carries in his veins the blood of a sturdy, long-lived Puritan ancestry. May his years yet be many to serve his brethren and the nation, to stand, as he has always stood, with spotless honor, in the respect and affection which will pass into tender remembrance of future ages of the church.

JOB'S TRIALS AND OURS.

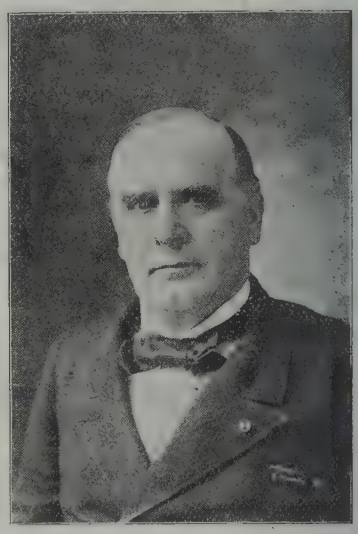
"Misfortunes never come singly," says the old proverb, and it seems to have been true in the case of the patriarch Job. Probably more than any other individual in human history he has been, and still is, regarded as an example of affliction. It is most interesting to study his history, to note the succession of his trials, their cumulative force, the failure of the consolations which naturally might have been expected to prove valuable, the peculiar exasperation caused him by comparative trifles—such as the pestering persistence of his friends, and, most of all, his realization of his need of God and his appreciation that he never had known God personally, so to speak, until anguish had opened his eyes.

We certainly know more about God than Job knew. We are better instructed than he can have been concerning the multiform and wonderful revelations of God in nature, society, politics and the development and progress of mankind. But whether we know God himself better than Job finally knew him, in the sense of reverent, loving, personal fellowship with him, who dares to assert? There is no reason why God may not have revealed himself to the patriarch of old as tenderly and fully as to any of us of today, nor any reason why we may not penetrate as deeply into the depths of the divine grace and love as could Job.

As for patience in trial and helpfulness towards the tried and distressed, we can learn much from Job. Few Old Testament characters are so picturesque or suggestive, so full of genuine humanity of all sorts, as his. It pays to study him, and, while one studies, the nobility of thought-fulness and benevolence towards others and the sublimity of courageous patience are impressed upon us ineradicably. Most of all we learn that no man, be he who he may, can live his life truly and successfully without personal fellowship with the Almighty.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Popular Verdict.



HON. WILLIAM MC KINLEY, PRESIDENT-ELECT.

Mr. William McKinley of Ohio and Mr. Garrett A. Hobart of New Jersey will be inaugurated President and Vice-President of the United States March 4, 1897, having received at least 277 votes of the electoral college, perhaps more, only 224 being necessary. They win also by a tremendous popular majority of not less than 1,100,000, carrying all of the New England and Middle States, the great States of the Interior and Northwest, California and Oregon on the Pacific slope, and Kentucky, West Virginia, Maryland and Delaware of States hitherto reckoned as part of the solid South. Kansas and Nebraska, the silver producing States of the West, except Wyoming, Washington on the Pacific slope and the South furnish Mr. Bryan with his votes. Elsewhere we have tried to interpret the meaning of this decisive verdict.

When it is remembered that the States carried for the Republican candidates by the union of Republicans, gold standard Democrats and conservative men of all parties or no parties, have about sixty per cent. of the population of the country, nearly seventy per cent. of its wealth, the lowest rates of illiteracy and nine-tenths of its cities and commercial centers, the import of the decision can be more truly understood. The fact that so many States of the South have been carried for candidates from Northern States, and that the Democratic majority in certain other States like Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia and Florida is so greatly reduced, is prophetic of a new era, providing the incoming administration acts wisely. The tremendous popular majorities in agricultural States like Wisconsin and Minnesota, in commercial and industrial centers like Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and the States of which they are capitals and nerve centers, and the votes in smaller manufacturing towns show that farmers, merchants, professional men and wage earners have come to about the same decision on the issue of the campaign and have no class differences, despite the efforts made so strenuously recently to cultivate them. Those who look upon the "foreign vote" as a dangerous element may be more optimistic after contemplating the record of our foreign born citizens in the recent campaign; and the verdict in our great cities would seem to indicate that they are healthier in tone and sounder in judgment than it has commonly been supposed they were.

The National Legislature and Its Action.

Measured by its effects upon Congress, the election is not as decisive as it might well have been. Republicans in the lower house of the Fifty-fifth Congress bid fair to be not less than 212 in number, and there also will be two gold Democrats who may be relied upon to act in harmony with the Republicans if the issue is joined squarely and solely on maintaining the gold standard, or defeating such compromise legislation favorable to silver as we have had altogether too much of since 1878. But the composition of the Senate will not be as favorable to the cause of gold, unless several of the senators now classed as friends of silver decide to accept the verdict of the Republican caucus and will subordinate their views in this matter to their views on other questions of public policy in which they find themselves more in harmony with the Republicans than with the Democrats of either wing; or unless the gold standard Democratic senators, men like Senators Gray of Delaware and Caffrey of Louisiana, will put principle above party and vote with the Republicans, their allies in the recent campaign. The present indications are that the Senate of the next Congress will be divided thus: gold Republicans thirty-seven, gold Democrats eight, silver Democrats twenty-six, silver Republicans ten and Populists nine. If so, then it is apparent that the vote of the Vice-President would have the deciding power in any contest in which the line was sharply drawn between silver and gold.

It seems to be taken for granted that Mr. McKinley as soon as inaugurated will call an extra session of the new Congress, and that the Republicans will at once set about revising revenue and currency legislation. Much depends, of course, on what is done by the Fifty-fourth Congress at its short session, and upon the course of events, commercial and diplomatic, between this and March. Mr. Dingley does not believe that the bill which he introduced at the last session, intended to give temporary relief, can be passed this winter. Apparently the new administration will not be compelled to face a dwindling or depleted gold reserve, domestic hoarding having ceased and the balance of trade in our favor continuing. But this will not lessen the legitimate demand for currency reform, nor affect materially the chronic disparity between revenue and expenditure.

The Effect.

Europe was intensely interested in the outcome. Friends, like Mr. James Bryce, because he and they loved and honored us and wished no harm to come to us. Enemies, like Prince Bismarck, because they would have rejoiced at disaster. Investors because of their past profits and future hopes. What Mr. Bryce thinks of the result he can best say:

> The choice lay between public honor and public dishonor, between the maintenance of public credit and measures which would destroy public credit, between the maintenance of the true genius and spirit of republican institutions and changes involving the greatest danger to the whole social fabric. That the people of the States have rejected the dangerous proposals, and shown in the strongest manner their determination that the national credit shall be maintained and the soundness of national currency be above suspicion, is due to the high level of intelligence and education which the great masses of American people have reached

What Prince Bismarck thinks we do not care, for his present rôle of a marplot and shelved, imbittered statesman is not such as to give his words weight, but it is interesting to find the Tageblatt of Berlin saying: "A nightmare has fallen from the mind of the civilized world. McKinley's victory encourages those who believe in the ability of nations to govern themselves." What investors think has been indicated in the prompt upward movement of prices of American securities abroad and the renewal of negotiations with American "promoters" seeking capital in Europe.

At home it has been as if a magician had waved his wand over the land and ordered mill fires to be lighted, spindles to turn, furnaces to renew their blasts and forging, and employers to set all men at work who desired to labor. Gold is a drug on the market. Savings banks are crowded with timid depositors reseeking the security of the banks which they doubted Nov. 2. Loan rates have fallen from abnormally high to phenomenally low prices. Railroad trains are crowded with commercial travelers en route for merchants who are now prepared to lay in stocks. Men now know where they stand, what they can count on, and are acting accordingly. If Congress will only be amenable to public opinion we shall see an era of exceeding activity and prosperity.

Thus far the Republican leaders have spoken as if they appreciated that the victory was not theirs, but the people's. The formal statements of Messrs. Bryan, Altgeld and Tillman respecting the verdict indicate that they do not intend to cease fighting along the same lines as in the campaign just ended. The formal statements, on the other hand, of such men as Secretary Morton and Comptroller Eckles indicate that the men who formulated the Indianapolis platform do not intend to recede from it, while the declarations of the leading Populists show a divergence of opinion respecting their gains from "fusion" which is ominous of quite as much dissension as exists in the Democratic camp. Apparently the work of disintegration and re alignment is to go on, and no man can predict the issues or name the leaders of the campaign of 1900.

The Outlook for the Future.

"Peace on earth, good will toward men," is Mr. McKinley's message to Europe. May it be the keynote of his foreign policy. Elsewhere we quote his interpretation of the meaning of the result for us at home. It is statesmanlike and optimistic in its outlook and policy. May he and we realize that there are, to quote Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington, just as many unprincipled people, just as many worthless citizens, just as many of the so-called dangerous classes in the land as there were on Nov. 2. "There is no magic in the casting of votes, that a transformation of a whole people's temper and disposition should follow the act. . . . It is indeed a fine thing that the battle should go as it ought, but what of those left wounded on the field, and what of the beaten army in retreat?" A great and serious task awaits the next Administration, for it must face or ignore, remedy or aggravate the evils which have caused the sense of injustice that has been the backbone of the uprising which Mr. Bryan has led. The Attorney General of the next Cabinet may be the most important member of it if Mr. McKinley is disposed to make him so. And while we are thinking of Cabinet officials let a protest be filed here and now against the nomination as Secretary of State of any one incapable of sympathy for and an understanding of American Christian missions. It will be well, too, if the Secretary of the Treasury can be a man of probity of character as well as a capable financier.

Some Side Issues Settled.

The overwhelming defeat of Governor Altgeld in Illinois removes from power there one who is generally conceded to be the ablest and most dangerous opponent of established institutions in this country. Mr. Hobart's election as Vice-President insures the elevation to the presidency, should Providence decree death for Mr. McKinley while in office, of one entirely competent to take up the reins of power. The defeat of Mr. Breckenridge in Kentucky saves Congress and the nation from the disgrace of having him re-enter public life.

Mr. Addicks cannot be elected to the United States Senate from Delaware because that State, though it chose McKinley electors, also elected a Democratic legislature. Hence, for a time at least, the Senate will be spared the presence of one whose only claim upon his party is his "boodle." In Michigan the chief representative of the A. P. A., Mr. Linton, has been defeated for Congress. In Providence, R. I., despite the Republican landslide, the citizens arose above partisanship and elected a faithful Democratic mayor, and, in fact, generally speaking, the people voted dispassionately and discriminatingly. Local and State issues were not entirely obscured by the great national issue, and suggested amendments to constitutions were not adopted simply because recommended. Thus Massachusetts rejected the scheme of biennial elections, and New York refused to undo the work of its recent constitutional convention and throw its forest preservations open again to the rapacity of manufacturers. In California the amendment granting woman suffrage was defeated by about 15,000 votes. Illinois, however, seems to have overlooked its work of constitutional revision, and the amendments will fail because of the neglect of the voters.

Mr. McKinley and Mr. Bryan Compared.

Mr. Bryan's telegram to Mr. McKinley acknowledging his own defeat and proffering congratulations, was gracefully worded and did him credit, but the same cannot be said for his pronunciamento sent out to his supporters the following day. Contrast its temper and purpose with the following words from the president-elect:

> The people in their majesty, ignoring party lines, have declared their detestation of repudiation and dishonor, in whatever specious guise they may be presented. They have, with the same mighty power, affirmed their devotion to law and order and their undeviating respect for justice and the courts. They have maintained their unfaltering determination to support and uphold the constituted authorities of the country, and have thereby given new vigor and strength to our free institutions. They have, indeed, again consecrated themselves to the country, and baptized the cherished ordinances of free government with a new and holy patriotism.
> The victory is not to party or section, but of and for the whole American people. Not the least of the triumphs of the election is the obliteration of sectional lines in the republic. We have demonstrated to the world that we are a reunited people in purpose as in name. We have manifested in the great cause the spirit of fraternity and brotherhood that should always characterize our common and equal citizenship, and have proven conclusively that in a country of equal privileges and equal opportunity the insidious doctrine of hate or of class or sectional distinctions cannot prevail.

But Mr. Bryan talks thus of his defeat:

Trusts and corporations have tried to excite a fear of lawlessness, while they have been defying the law, and American financiers have boasted that they were the custodians of national honor, while they were secretly bartering away the nation's financial independence. But in spite of the efforts of the Administration and its supporters, in spite of the threats of money loaners at home and abroad, in spite of the coercion practiced by corporations and employers, in spite of trusts and syndicates, in spite of enormous Republican funds, and in spite of the influence of a hostile daily press, bimetallism has almost triumphed in its first great fight.

France Frightens the Sultan.

The debate in the French House of Deputies last week enabled some of the Socialist and Roman Catholic deputies to denounce in unmeasured language the Armenian atrocities and the supineness of European Powers, and it called forth from M. Hanotaux, minister of foreign affairs, a statement which, though far from belligerent in its spirit, created such excitement in Constantinople that the sultan speedily summoned the French ambassador, M. Cambon, to him and, ascertaining that France (and Russia) meant business, soon issued orders for reforms that are calculated to better conditions throughout the empire. The Vali of Diarbekir has been dismissed for his share in the disorders there. All military governors have been informed by telegraph that they will be held answerable for further bloodshed. A decree extending the reforms promised for Anatolia to the entire empire is now before the Council of Ministers. Nor is Crete being forgotten. A joint note has just reminded the Porte that her pledges of reform there must be redeemed. If these be straws showing how the tide is to run henceforth, Christendom may congratulate itself.

Lord Salisbury's Guild Hall Speech.

Lord Salisbury, the British minister of foreign affairs, made the important announcement, last Monday evening, that all controversy between Great Britain and the United States over Venezuela was at an end. He says:

Our difficulty for months has been to define the settled disputes, and the solution has, I think, come from the Government of the United States that we should treat our colonial empire as we treat individuals; that the same lapse of time which protects the latter in civic life from having their title questioned should similarly protect an English colony, but beyond that, when a lapse could not be claimed, there should be an examination of title and all the equity demanded in regard thereto should be granted. I do not believe I am using unduly sanguine words when I declare my belief that this has brought the controversy to an end.

How great a victory this is for our diplomacy it is not necessary for us to estimate now. Our chief joy now is in the thought that there is no chance of controversy or war between mother and son.

Lord Salisbury's references to the situation in Turkey, so far as they revealed his purpose, indicated no intention to give up either Cyprus or Egypt, and hinted at a drawing together of Great Britain and Russia. He repudiated the notion that permanent antagonism between them was necessary. Indeed, he pronounced such an idea as "a superstition of antiquated diplomacy," which, be it said, is a rather hard slap at the memory of his old leader, Lord Beaconsfield.

Lord Salisbury, in replying to Mr. Bayard's interpretation of the meaning of our recent election, said:

I thank the ambassador of the United States for his presence here and for joining a great historic meeting. By the few words he has uttered he has raised his own plane of observation so high above the mere level of party that, though contrary to practice to remark upon the internal politics of other states, I may be permitted, without impertinence, to congratulate him upon the splendid pronouncement the great people he represents have made in behalf of the principles which lie at the base of all human society.

NOTES.

Mayor Strong has appealed to the clergymen and church trustees of New York city to aid the Board of Education of that city by giving up for secular uses the rooms used by the Sunday schools. This is the outcome of the failure of the metropolis to build schoolhouses as fast as they were needed.

The Massachusetts district, formerly represented by John Quincy Adams and Horace Mann, after next March will have a worthy representative in Rev. S. J Barrows, editor of the Christian Register. We wish he could go on to Washington next month and voice the opinion of the Christian people of this country respecting Armenia's woes and Turkey's treatment of the citizens of this country engaged in missionary work.

The unconditional pardon of the former queen of the Hawaiian Islands, Liliuokalani, certifies to her good behavior as a suspect and the stability of the present form of government. The news that the Hawaiian planters are planning to import Armenians as an addition to the laboring population of the islands is interesting and suggestive. From Russia to Japan on the vessels used in transporting Russian oil and thence to Hawaii—that is the plan.

Bismarck has revealed another state secret, calculated to make all present and future European treaties less secure. He says that in 1875 Russia approached Germany to know whether, if Austria were attacked by Russia, Germany would remain neutral. Bismarck says that he was loyal to Austria, hence Russia, seeking for an outlet for her belligerent spirit somewhere, came to terms with Austria and then attacked Turkey. More revelations of the same kind are promised, and Kaiser Wilhelm realizes that he must put a stop to it. But how?

Massachusetts's vote was significant. Mr. McKinley received 273 004 votes, Mr. Bryan 104,282 and Mr. Palmer 11,865, every city and town in the State but one giving Mr. McKinley a plurality. Governor Wolcott received a plurality of 151,743, the disparity between his vote and Mr. McKinley's not being due to lack of popularity, but because many of the gold Democrats who voted for Mr. McKinley voted their own State ticket in order to give it the number of votes requisite to secure it a place on the official ballot of 1897, and they succeeded. The legislature will have eight Democrats in a total of 280 members.

IN BRIEF.

Our compliments to the Baptist clergyman of Saratoga who, missing his train while journeying home to vote, mounted a bicycle and "scorched" twenty-two miles, arriving at the polls just in time to vote.

Two ways of helping the Armenians are set forth this week. The first is by gifts to our Armenian Orphans' Fund. The second by employing the refugees now in Boston. See pages 706 and 738. Can you not do one or the other, or both?

Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith, by his absurd attacks against the Armenian people and American missionaries in Turkey, seems to be about equally moved by desires to help his two friends in that country, the sultan and Judge Terrell. Probably they both have about equal occasion for gratitude.

Most of our religious exchanges went to press on or before Tuesday, last week. Nearly all these announced that "when this paper reaches our subscribers the great political struggle will be over." Were any readers of these papers enlightened by this solemn announcement?

Both of the leading candidates for the presidency, during all the excitement of the campaign, honored the Lord's Day and regularly attended public worship, and by so doing they increased the esteem in which they are held by the public. These facts combined are a good omen for the nation.

What caused the President to be so fervent in his Thanksgiving proclamation? It is as orthodox and pious as if John Calvin had written it. By the way, after March 4 John Wesley, and not John Calvin, will be the patron saint of the White House. Henceforth Cabinet meetings will not be "sessions," but "class meetings." May no one "fall from grace."

Great men frequently have to experiment before they find their life work. Dr. Quint studied medicine for a while, and Dr. Storrs began to study law with Rufus Choate as mentor. Cicero was Rufus Choate's favorite orator and model. This being remembered, the reference in Dr. Lyman's article to Dr. Storrs's Ciceronic style is most suggestive of transmitted ideals and methods.

The streets of Boston are crowded with shoppers on Monday, because of the bargains announced in the Sunday newspapers. But of the large dry goods houses which advertise it is worthy of special notice that no advertisement of the firm of R. H. Stearns & Co. appears in any Sunday paper. Yet perhaps no house of the kind in Boston is more popular and prosperous than this one.

We do not need to seek far for modern signs of the Holy Spirit's power while there are such missionary meetings as the annual convention of the Woman's Board, a report of which we publish this week. The prevailing impression was not merely in the line of aroused interest and enthusiasm, not even of the urgent need of advance, but rather a deep conviction of the privilege of being permitted to share in speeding forward the kingdom.

In Germany ten times as many Jews as Christians in proportion to their relative population are to be found in the universities. Some of the richest families in Europe belong to that race. The mayor-elect of London is a Jew. But neither in Europe nor in the United States do Jews show any desire to go back to the land of their ancestors, and among the less than 50,000 now in Palestine none are to be found of much wealth or any recognized ability for leadership.

Prof. George Adam Smith of Glasgow receives many inquiries from Americans concerning courses of study in the universities of that city and of Edinburgh, and also as to the cost of living. The desired information may be found in the Scottish Church and University Calendar and in the Church College Calendar. These may be ordered at one shilling each from Messrs. MacNiver and Wallace, Princess Street, Edinburgh. As to the cost of living, Professor Smith says, "One may live as cheaply or as dearly as he will."

Ministers are scarce in the legislatures, but when they are sent there we believe they usually prove to be useful legislators. We look for such a career in the next Massachusetts House of Representatives for Rev. C. P. Mills of Newburyport. Two excellent proofs of his popularity have recently been given to him. One is the fact that he has just completed sixteen years in his first pastorate, with the North Church of that city. The other is his election to the legislature, as an Independent, with a handsome majority over the regular party nominees.

When Dr. Quint was recently remonstrated with on the danger of taking part in funeral services, always a severe strain on that great, tender heart, so frail in later years, he replied: "Yes, I know it hurts me, but I must do it," adding gently, "You know we must always do what we can—as long as we can." How faithfully and generously he fulfilled this article of his creed is indicated by the grateful testimony of multitudes who found him ever ready to sympathize and advise with them in perplexity, or to render any of the manifold services for which he seemed peculiarly fitted.

It must have been good to sit at the feet of Mr. Barrie and Dr. Nicoll of the British Weekly as they spoke to the notable gathering of authors and publishers under the roof of the Aldine Club, New York city, last week. Hamilton W. Mabie presided, and Mr. Howells, Mr. Cable, Thomas Nelson Page, Charles Dudley Warner and Dr. S. Weir Mitchell spoke. Dr. Nicoll said that which deserves quoting: "I do not see that weariness is in England's heart, or languor on her brow, but if failure or death should come, we should have one consolation—we should be proud of having been your mother."

There come times when the most skillful writers of prose have to resort to the songs of the poets for adequate voicing of their own and others' thoughts. Thus the day before the election the New York Sun printed all of Whittier's The Eve of Election Day as its leading editorial, the Springfield Republican printed part of Longfellow's Sail On, O Ship of State, and the New York Evening Post recalled to mind Frances Anne Kemble's splendid sonnet, Triumph Not, Fools, in which she said to the scoffing rulers and priests of Europe:

Triumph not, fools, and weep not, ye faint-hearted!
Have ye believed that the supreme decree
Of Heaven had given this people o'er to perish?
Have ye believed that God had ceased to cherish
This great New World of Christian liberty?
And its fair light forever had departed?
Nay—by the precious blood shed to redeem
The nation from its selfishness and sin,
By each brave heart that burst in holy strife,
Leaving its kindred hearts to break through life;
By all the bitter tears whose source must stream
Forever every desolate home within,
We will return to our appointed place,
First in the vanguard of the human race.

THE STORY OF DR. QUINT'S LIFE.

Dr. Quint was blessed with a worthy and distinguished ancestry. He could hardly help being a patriot when his own grandfather and no less than three great-grandfathers were soldiers in the Revolutionary War. Others of his progenitors had part in the French and Indian wars and helped to capture Port Royal. His mother's grandfather founded the Free Baptist denomination in America, and this fact may explain Dr. Quint's activity in promoting present endeavors to bring Congregationalists and Free Baptists closer together. Dr. Quint's father was engaged in manufacturing in Dover for over fifty years, and the son never lost his fondness for the place where his earlier years were spent and where he still retained his citizenship.

Dr. Quint was born, an only son, March 22, 1828, in Barnstead, N. H. He fitted for college at Franklin Academy, Dover, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1846, at the early age of eighteen. After three years spent in various employments he entered Andover Seminary, where he graduated in 1852, and took there, immediately, a year of post-graduate work. His ordination took place at the Central Church, Jamaica Plain, March 27, 1853, and the occasion was rendered doubly impressive by the fact that he was simultaneously installed the first pastor of the young church, now one of the strongest in the cordon of outlying Boston churches. At the outbreak of the war his church gave him leave of absence, and he became chaplain of the famous Second Massachusetts Infantry, remaining with the regiment until the summer of 1864. He took a strenuous part in the campaign, and shared with the soldiers all the vicissitudes of camp, march and battle-field. J. S. C. Abbott, in his history of the war, pronounces Dr. Quint one of the most heroic chaplains of the war. In 1863 he had insisted that there should be a formal separation from his beloved charge at Jamaica Plain, and so, on his return from the South, he was free to accept another pastorate. This was over the North Church, New Bedford. His ministry there lasted until 1875, when he resigned on account of precarious health. He never took another pastorate, but he acted in the capacity of pastor for several other churches in the suburbs of Boston. Among them were the Broadway Church in Somerville and the West Roxbury church. He served at Allston from 1886 until 1890, when he refused longer to permit the church to go on without securing a permanent official leader.

The period from 1875 to 1896, then, may be considered the period of his pastorate at large. He had already been thrown into close ecclesiastical relations with the denomination by being chosen, in 1856, the secretary of the Massachusetts General Association. This office he held until 1881. In 1871 his secretarial duties were further extended by his being chosen secretary of the National Council, whose regular triennial sessions began in that year. This position he held until 1883. His intimate association with the National Council, of whose business committe he was chairman in 1865, as well as chairman of its committee on constitution, and temporary presiding officer at Oberlin in 1871, led naturally to the origination and elaboration of the Year-Book, which he edited for many years until he passed the task over to Dr. Hazen. He served on the board of directors of the Congregational Publishing Society for twenty-five years.

These years since resigning the active pastorate have been marked by important and various services to the denomination at large. As a director of the American Congregational Association he exercised constant supervision over the property of the association, and particularly over the library, which to a large extent was his creation, as it always was his pet. As a corporate member of the American Board he was usually present at its annual meeting, and his part as mediator in the controversy which nearly split the Board a few years ago was no small one. He has been for the last four years one of the three members of the Board of Visitors at Andover, and after the death of Professor Pease he gave instruction in homiletics for two years until a permanent successor could be obtained. A short while before this he was called to Auburn for several months to perform similar work in the Presbyterian Seminary.

Dr. Quint was prominent in Masonic and Grand Army circles, being among those who formed the first G. A. R. Post in New England, at New Bedford. He belonged to the Loyal Legion and attended its annual dinners quite frequently. He was an esteemed member of the New England Historic Genealogical Society.

His published works have not been as many as his friends could desire. His army letters, most of which appeared first in The Congregationalist, were gathered in a volume called Potomac and Rapidan. He also put in permanent form the records of the Second Massachusetts Infantry and of the First Parish in Dover, N. H. He contributed many articles to the Dover Enquirer, and various sermons and public addresses by him have been published.

Dartmouth College always found a use for Dr. Quint's wisdom and foresight. It honored him in 1866 with the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and in 1870 he became a trustee. At the time of his death he was the senior member of the board. He presided at the inauguration of President Tucker two years ago, and it is interesting to recall that one of his last public addresses was at Hanover, on the evening known as Dartmouth night, when he spoke for the trustees. But recently, too, he has addressed the Grand Army Post at New Bedford, while his final public appearance was on the platform of Faneuil Hall at the recent A. M. A. jubilee. It is certainly a singular circumstance that his last three public addresses were on themes quite diverse in character, but each particularly congenial to his mind.

Dr. Quint has not been an entirely well man since the war, but his sturdy appearance and the work which he performed gave a misleading impression of his actual condition. The heart difficulty which finally caused his death has been his constant companion for many years, and few have guessed the extent and continuousness of the pain which he suffered from it. He had been in apparently ordinary health through last summer and autumn, being an almost daily visitor to the Congregational House. His absence last week Monday from the Ministers' Meeting and from his usual haunts was found to be due to an attack of the previous Sunday, from which, however, no immediate serious consequences were anticipated up to almost the very hour of his death. He had attended church and partaken of the communion at Allston, and on his way back to his home in West Roxbury stopped for dinner with old friends on Scotia Street, Boston, whom he was in the habit of visiting frequently. There Mrs. Quint joined him, and there the first premonition of the end came in the form of an attack such as those to which he was accustomed. The plan for returning to West Roxbury that day was abandoned, and Monday and Tuesday passed without any marked change. On Tuesday he dictated letters, one of which had to do with the important matters now before the committee on plans for the new Congregational House, and as late as Wednesday morning at three he had strength to stand on his feet and take his medicine. The end came very unexpectedly to the watchers, but peacefully, an hour later.

Looking back over the last few weeks his friends now see certain indications of his own impression that his life was not to be prolonged many months. He knew that death probably would come suddenly, but he hoped that he might not be smitten down on the street. He spoke once or twice to his wife of his dread of the cold winter. And though he was the last man to indulge in whimsical premonitions, or to sadden others by reference to his own condition, it seems more than probable that he was conscious of the nearness of the end. The prostration in the summer of his intimate friend and associate, Dr. Walker, was a great sorrow to him, and the death of Professor Blaisdell four weeks ago, his seminary classmate, was another severe shock.

Dr. Quint's family life was a peculiarly happy one. He married, Jan. 1, 1854, Rebecca P. Putnam of Salem, Mass. The oldest daughter, Clara G., died last April. She was a woman of rare abilities, and one in whom her parents justly took pride. The three surviving children are Katherine M. Quint, who was the first woman to receive an M. A. from Dartmouth, that honor being conferred last June; Wilder D. Quint, one of the editors of the Boston Traveler; and John H. Quint, who graduated at Bangor Seminary last June and is now taking a year of additional study at Bowdoin College, after which he expects to enter the Congregational ministry. Mrs. Quint has ministered with great fidelity and tenderness to her husband throughout the years. To her he dictated most of his articles and letters. The sympathy of a wide circle of friends is about her and her children in this the time of their severe bereavement.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Order, Election Day.

Judging from past experiences there were good reasons to look for riots and bloodshed at the polls Tuesday. At midnight the mayor and the chief of police could say that not a single disturbance had occurred in any voting precinct or on any of the streets of the city. This was due to the fact, first of all, that the saloons were closed both in the rear and in front, then that it was known that the chief would promptly dismiss any subordinate who should in any way fail to do his duty, and that from the opening of the polls in the morning till they were closed in the afternoon, he would travel from precinct to precinct. Mayor Swift, since the election, has pointed with pride to the fact that the city now has a police force which is non-partisan and entirely divorced from political influence. The quiet of Tuesday makes it evident that, difficult as it is, municipal government is possible, and that even in present conditions is not unattainable. Business already is responding to the hope of better times, and the prospects of terrible sufferings from the army of the unemployed are not likely to be realized. There will be a great increase in building, and many enterprises which, had the result been different would have been given up, will now be pushed forward. Not a few prominent and thoughtful business men in Chicago look upon the defeat of Messrs. Bryan and Altgeld as no less important in the history of our country than the surrender of General Lee. Few persons outside the State can realize the burden we have borne in the governorship of Mr. Altgeld. He has been the intellectual force in the present campaign. One can but rejoice that by a majority of about 100 000 his power as a leader in the political life of Illinois has been reduced to a minimum and that, in all probability, he will soon vanish from sight.

Receiving the Returns.

Not since the days of the Civil War has there been such eagerness to hear the results of an election as was manifest Tuesday night. The great dailies made arrangements to meet the demands of the people. The results of the voting in different States were made known by search-light and various colored bombs thrown from the roof of some of the highest buildings. The Tribune secured the Coliseum, where the returns were shown by stereopticon as fast as they came in to an audience which was estimated at 25,000. Postmaster Hessing presided, and with the help of musicians managed to keep the great crowd quiet through the long hours of waiting. At half a dozen different points in the city these returns were shown by stereopticon. But the multitudes thronged the spaces near the down-town offices of the papers. Passing was well-nigh impossible. The crowd was orderly, good-natured, obliging. There was no drunkenness. People were, however, intensely excited. As news favorable to the Republican candidate began to come in, the crowd went wild with its cheers. It was patient but solicitous when reports favorable to Mr. Bryan were shown on the canvas in front of the newspaper offices. By midnight the majority was satisfied. The streets looked lonely, for it was believed that the battle had been won and the country saved from the dishonor and the dangers which had threatened it. It was noticed with not a little surprise that great numbers of Bryan men expressed themselves as more than satisfied with the result. They had voted for Mr. Bryan, they said, because he was their candidate, but they were glad McKinley was elected, because his election means better times. It is to be hoped that the successful party will realize the responsibility which has been thrust upon it, and that efforts will be made as soon as possible, and continually, to remedy any injustice in our present laws, and to see that all men enjoy equal rights and privileges under the Constitution.

Ministers' Meeting.

It is not surprising that the attendance was small. The day before election was exciting even for ministers. Dr. Simeon Gilbert read a finely written, comprehensive paper on the Grindelwald Conference. He reviewed the significant events leading to its establishment, pointed out the work which in various directions it has already done, and indicated some of the ways in which it may favorably affect the religious interests of the future. The paper was listened to with real interest, and the labor bestowed upon it was thoroughly appreciated. A brief report of the jubilee meeting of the A. M. A. in Boston was made by Dr. Savage. An item of personal interest to all who know him was the fact that Dr. Savage during his absence from the city occupied the pulpit in his native town, Cromwell, Ct., where fifty years before he preached his first sermon, and that four or five of those who listened to his last sermon heard and remembered the first. Long may its author be spared to bless our circles with his presence.

President Eaton at Beloit.

Dr. Eaton has just completed ten years of service as the president of Beloit College. This week students and professors made a demonstration in his honor, at which the progress of the institution for a decade was carefully traced and due credit given to the agent chosen of God for its accomplishment. To one who recalls Beloit as it was ten years since, the present position is full of encouragement. There are now more students in the Freshman Class than in all the classes of 1886. Four or five costly and important buildings have been secured and to the endowments hundreds of thousands of dollars have been added. What Beloit needs is to be able to report at the jubilee Commencement this coming summer that $200,000 more have been provided and that this has been further increased by the $50,000 pledged by Dr. Pearsons.

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Board of the Interior.

All accounts agree that the meeting at Des Moines this year was one of more than ordinary interest. There was a large attendance, a great deal of enthusiasm and, above all, the ability to report the closing of the year without debt. Although there was some doubt about the wisdom of the proceeding, it was determined that efforts should be put forth to obtain as much next year as had been obtained last year, $80,000, inasmuch as any curtailing of expenses means the inflicting of great hardship upon missionaries and serious crippling of their work. One of the more interesting features of the meeting was the recognition of the twenty fifth anniversary of the service of Mrs. Moses Smith as president of the board. To her the recognition came as a surprise, and was all the more welcome because of its surprise and the heartiness of those from whom the recognition came. Few agencies in the Interior have been productive of more good, either in the way of gathering funds or of uniting the churches together, than the Board of the Interior, and its success in this respect has been due to the admirable manner in which it has been managed.

Sunday Evening Services.

In many of our churches the attendance evenings is unusually large. At the Third Church Dr. Withrow always has a crowd. He prints the hymns and Scripture for responsive reading. The Apostles' Creed, which is recited at this service, is also printed. The audience joins almost universally in the responses, and seems to take pleasure in doing so. A similar plan followed by the Church of the Redeemer has resulted in securing a large evening audience. These evening services are under the auspices of the Young Men's Club. The South, the Warren Avenue and the California Avenue churches are always full Sunday evenings. Since the return of Dr. Noble Union Park, with an auditorium seating about two thousand, has been nearly full every Sunday evening, and the audience seems to be increasing. The First and Second Baptist and the Centenary Methodist churches are always largely attended in the evening. There are scores of other churches where evening audiences are encouraging, even if they are not larger than those in the morning. If one can judge from appearances, the interest in Christian work the coming season will be greater than for several years. Even the present exciting political campaign has not weakened the interest in religious things.

The Western Estimate of Dr. Quint.

The report of the death of Dr. Quint brings sorrow to many hearts in the West. Many who did not know him personally, who had never been brought under the influence of his genial and helpful spirit, have honored him for what he has done for our churches, for the force he proved himself to be in our national gatherings, for his writings on our polity as well as for his articles on other topics. He was one of a very remarkable group of men not long since frequently seen in and about the Congregational House, Boston. Dexter, Richardson, Quint, what memories these names recall; what blessings have come to our churches and to the kingdom of God the world over through their counsels, through the realization of plans which they formed and helped to carry out. Keenly as we shall miss him—and Western hearts mourn for him as sincerely as Eastern—we rejoice as we think of him with that loved daughter whose absence from earth has been such a sorrow to him these last months, and with those friends from whom he was inseparable when they and he were here in health and strength. Through this paragraph hundreds of ministers in this section of the country would gladly express their sympathy with the bereaved family circle, and with those daily associates who knew how to prize at its true worth the friendship with which he honored them. His name and memory can never be dropped out from that brilliant galaxy of names which adorn our Congregational history.

THE FROSTS OF LIFE.

The corn would wring its utmost gold
From autumn's sunny hoard in vain,
Did not the night-frosts keen and cold,
Bring ripeness to the patient grain.

The labor of the summer sun,
To fill the grapes would have been lost,
Had not each purple cluster won
The last maturing touch of frost.

And we, who fain would sun the heart
In ceaseless warmth of shadeless hours,
Need frosts of trial to impart
A mellow bloom to all our powers.

For thus is formed the wholesome bread,
That feeds the hunger of the soul;
And thus the mystic wine is shed,
To make the wounded spirit whole.

We taste and see that God is good;
The sacrament of pain doth give Christ's solace in the sorest mood—
Heaven's faith and hope to wisely live.
—Hugh Macmillan, in Sunday Magazine.

One of the strongest arguments in favor of women riding the bicycle is embodied in the experience of a teacher who occupies a responsible position in a large and influential private school. She affirms that whenever perplexed or worried by important matters of administration or discipline she invariably defers judgment until she has taken a long ride on her wheel. The exercise steadies the nerves, clarifies the brain and puts her in a condition to make wiser decisions. Moreover, she finds that trifles which rasp and fret within doors often vanish on returning from an invigorating spin in the open air. For those who do not care for bicycling, walking serves much the same purpose. An English physician says on this point: "Never have I found so perfect a remedy against that mental condition commonly spoken of as 'the blues' as a good brisk walk."

In visiting one of the women's colleges in England, last summer, we were struck with the simplicity in the furnishings of the students' rooms as compared with similar quarters here in America. The English girl has fewer pictures, possibly only one, but that is certain to be choice as to subject, even though it be only a photograph. She has fewer ornaments, scarfs, cushions, draperies and miscellaneous knicknacks, yet the rooms look neither bare nor uninviting. None of the essentials for real comfort are lacking, but there are no evidences of luxurious habits. The impression made upon the visitor was an air of repose conducive to study. There is no objection to a girl's making a bazar of her room if she chooses, but it is a fair question whether too much time may not be consumed in keeping it properly dusted and in order, and whether a multiplicity of objects around one when engaged in study may not tend to mental distraction.

Few persons are so ill-bred as to neglect altogether the acknowledgment of a gift, yet there are many who lack the grace of acknowledging a present well. The donor, who, perhaps, expended a deal of thought in trying to make a suitable selection, is often left in doubt whether the particular article chosen has conferred any pleasure or not. Yet the recipient is truly grateful and feels that she has discharged her whole duty by saying thank you in a general way. It would be easy, however, in most cases, to specify how the gift gave pleasure, and thus relieve the giver from an embarrassing sense of having made a mistake in her choice. If it is an article of household decoration mention where you have placed it, if something in the line of personal adornment state some occasion when you are likely to wear it, if a book, allude to a particular feature or passage in which you anticipate enjoyment. The art of gracefully acknowledging favors of any kind is well worth cultivating.

TEACHING CHILDREN TO GIVE.

BY REV. CORNELIUS H. PATTON.

I recognize the danger of quoting approvingly anything that is done by a certain gentleman of means (to put it lightly) who has gained the reputation of being the most liberal man of his time by pouring his oil upon the troubled waters of needy churches and schools of the Baptist persuasion. However, we ought to be able to learn a thing or two from one who gives his millions as easily as most rich men give their hundreds, and who always gives wisely. The thing that pleases me most about him is that he intends that his children after him shall be not only givers but also intelligent givers. I learn from a good source that when an application for help comes to this man from an individual or an institution, he first lays it before his family, reciting the facts in the case and calling for an opinion from each child in turn. After they all have passed upon the case he states his own conclusion and the reasons for it, often with shrewd observations upon human nature and the manner in which the Lord's money should be dispensed.

This example of child training in benevolence ought to commend itself to all parents, and especially to all who are concerned with the money side of religious work. The distress of our churches and benevolent societies during the past three years has taught us many things, and among them the need of laying deeper foundations of benevolence in the character and habits of the little folks. Mr. Rockefeller is likely to accomplish even more through teaching his children to give than by his own princely munificence. Even an impecunious pastor or Sunday school teacher may give his thousands through a boy who, being taught to be liberal in the days of small things, continues in the same virtue in the days of wealth.

The time to begin is at the beginning, and the first thing to do is to secure right impressions of money. A child has to be taught the use of money, even though it is to be expended for selfish enjoyment. Why not teach it the higher use from the first? A little girl this side of three, who is fond of banging on my study door when I am writing, thinks that silver dollars are meant solely for her amusement when her papa spins them on the window-sill. She is more fond of five silver dollars than of one simply because they make a finer show when all going at the same time. In another year she is likely to think that a dollar is meant solely to provide her with dolls, toys and perhaps dresses. It will be her parents' fault if she does not come to realize that the best thing that can happen to a dollar is to fall into the contribution box. Started in time and managed in a proper way, the higher lesson can be learned, if not as readily, certainly as surely, as the lower. When the age of discrimination sets in then that dollar will have to be split up, as it ought to be, and the child taught to appropriate it in right proportions for various uses.

I was greatly interested to find the other day that the first money received into the treasury of Carleton College was given by a little boy who earned it by selling popcorn, and that the first money that came as a result of a general canvass of the State was from a little girl, who sent in two silver half dollars, which she had received in her infancy and held as her most precious keepsakes. Is it any wonder that one of those coins is kept now in the college archives as a memento of what the children of twenty-five years ago were willing to do for Christian education? It is as easy to interest children in a college or a mission kindergarten as in anything else, unless it be a menagerie, and even the menagerie may be annexed to the belongings of some of our mission stations.

I am sometimes asked what methods to use for "extracting money" from children. Well, if money is to be "extracted," I can only refer the inquirer to the dentist, who has various tools adapted for that kind of work. When I heard such a request not long ago I was reminded of the story of a man who swallowed a half dollar which stuck in his throat. His wife tried to draw it out, but without success, and as he was in great agony she called in a surgeon. He worked over the man for half an hour, suggested tracheotomy, then decided against it, and finally gave the case up, remarking that she would better send immediately for the Methodist minister. Whereupon she was greatly alarmed and said, "O, doctor, you don't think he is going to die do you?" "O, no, madam," he replied, "but if anybody can get fifty cents out of that man a Methodist minister can." I fear many of our schemes for raising money from adults, as well as from children, are too much on the—I will not say Methodist order—but on the extracting order.

It is well to appeal to their child-fancies in the means used for gathering their little gifts. There is a gospel of the mite-box, and I often think some people who furnish supplies have never heard it, when I look at the ugly things they send us for storing the pennies. A mite-box or bank should appeal to the giver's fancy. They are not intended for the superior beings who sign checks for a million. The ladies of the Woman's Home Missionary Association hit it about right when they sent out those "children's wigwam banks," with their realistic pictures of Indian life, in order to store the pennies of the little friends of the A. M. A. The General Howard tent, which the C. H. M. S. issued, is the same idea applied for a different work. I have known even aged saints among the women to yield to the seducements of a wigwam bank after they had scorned to look at a maroon-colored box covered with Scriptural exhortations. A month before last Christmas we gave the children in the pastor's class dolls' stockings to hang up for Jesus, just to surprise him when he found them full of pennies. Probably he never before had had a Christmas stocking, but this time he had seventy five of them, and very pretty they looked, too, hanging on a clothesline across the church at the Christmas festival. Then came "old clock liberality," which was run by one of the big girls who was out of sight, but struck with a verse from the little girls down below, a word for each hour and all about giving.

Most mite-boxes are too large. They discourage even the officers of the "branch," to say nothing of the prospective workers, whose earnings run from five to ten cents per month. The other day in a toy store I found the ideal thing in the shape of a little log-cabin bank, made of wood, with a chimney outside, and a gorgeous red roof and other adornments, and all for one cent. They hold just twenty-five pennies, and I immediately bought up the whole stock. A cent invested in such a benevolent storehouse will prove the best kind of real estate.

To teach discrimination in giving have the children keep a benevolent account. Twenty children in a class were given each a little iron safe with key and a bank-book. The account was supposed to be with "O. P. J.," the ancient worthy who instituted proportional benevolence. The children placed a definite proportion of their money in the bank for religious work. This they credited themselves in the books, and the expenditures for Sunday school, mission band, church collections, etc., were also noted on the opposite page. Once a month the account was inspected by the pastor, who commented on the way the charity funds had been disbursed very much as Mr. Rockefeller does with his children. Accounts which balanced and had been properly administered were "O. K.'ed," with plentiful use of red ink and ruling, and the children began to know how to give with discrimination, as well as to think giving was more fun than buying. In children's societies they should have their own treasurer, as well as other officers. I saw a constitution of a boys' club in a colored school down South which had this original provision, "There shall be two treasury men, one to hold the box and the other to hold the key." A multiplication of officers is both safe and expedient.

Finally, teach the children to believe in the "almighty dollar." Why should we scorn that designation? The trouble with the American people is not that they seek the almighty dollar, but that they seek a dollar which is not almighty, a dollar which serves only to procure inferior or questionable objects. The "almighty dollar" is the Almighty's dollar, and no other has any right to the name. It is a dollar which is able to transform character, to give it an eternal quality—a dollar, in short, which becomes treasure in heaven. It is when people see the power of money for eternal soul worth that they will seek it and spend it in the right way. Encourage the children to do that. Tell them how powerful a dollar is when expended for the Lord, and how transitory and disappointing it is when expended in any other way. The transformation of matter into money and of money into character should be set before every boy as the end of business. That is what the Minnesota boy discovered when he sold pop-corn to make money and gave money to build Carleton College.

A writer in the Nineteenth Century objects to women serving with men on school boards and in other public capacities on the ground that "the overpowering fascination exercised by the women will transform the men into their humble followers, incapable alike of argument or opposition"! Mrs. Maitland, a well-known member of the London School Board, gives a crushing reply to the charge in these words: "Though the article is intended to be adverse to the claims of women, it seems to me a much more deadly insult to men. If they are so hopelessly weak that they cannot do business with one or two women among them they must be almost unfit to conduct business at all."

THE INDIAN SUMMER.

'Tis the time
When the chime
Of the seasons' choral band is ringing out.
Smoky brightness fills the air,
For the light winds everywhere
Censers full of flowery embers swing about.
There is sweetness that oppresses,
As a tender parting blesses;
There's a softened glow of beauty,
As when Love is wreathing Duty;
There are melodies that seem
Weaving past and future into one fair dream.

To her bier
Comes the year,
Not with weeping and distress, as mortals do;
But, to guide her way to it,
All the trees have torches lit;
Blazing red the maples shine the woodlands through;
Gay witch hazels in the river
Watch their own bright tapers quiver;
Flickering burn the birches yellow
Through the walnuts brown and mellow;
Dark, sad pines stand breathless by,
Mourners sole, and mourning that they cannot die.

Through the trees
Tolls the breeze.
Tolls, then rings a merry peal, and tolls again.
Dead leaves, shaken by the sound,
Slowly float and drop around.
So does memory lull or echo thoughts of pain.
Dead leaves lie upon earth's bosom,
Side by side with many a blossom;
Gentians, fringed with azure glory—
Sky-flakes, dropped on meadows hoary;
Asters, thick and bright as sparks
Struck by seraph oarsmen from their starry barks.

O, to die
When the sky
Smiles behind the Indian summer's hazy veil!
Thus to glorify decay,
Going in life's best array
Unto groves where death is a forgotten tale.
Falls a sorrow on the spirit?
Heavenly hopes are springing near it.
Earth, a happy child, rejoices,
Keeping time with angel voices.
When such autumn days are done,
There's a crown behind thy rays, thou setting sun!

THE NEW BICYCLES AND HORSELESS CARRIAGES.

BY GEORGE ETHELBERT WALSH.

The past summer has been distinctly a "bicycle season," when nearly everybody seemed to be riding, and those who ought to know tell us that the summer of 1897 will eclipse anything witnessed in the past in the number and variety of bicycles, tandems, tricycles, sextuplets and horseless vehicles of various makes. The new era of travel has thus come to stay, and every sort of business will be affected by a method of locomotion that is as cheap as it is popular. During the last twelve months the progress made in the manufacture of horseless vehicles is so tremendous that some of the results are almost startling to one who has not kept pace with the reports of scientific journals.

There has been a good deal of newspaper speculation about the possibilities of the cycle in supplying us with means of rapid transit little short of flying, and many of the apparent wild vagaries have been realized in actual invention. The chainless bicycle, for instance, will be made next year, although the idea of manufacturing practical wheels without a chain has always been scouted. In France the chainless bicycle has been manufactured and successfully used for some time, and several firms will place the wheel on the American market next summer. This will be a distinct improvement over the present chain wheel, for the machinery is all dust proof and much stronger and easier to work. The method of driving the wheel is the same, but instead of the chain a long shaft runs from the hub of the hind wheel to the crank in the middle of the machine, and by means of bevel gears this turns around when the pedals are pushed. The shaft and gears are all inclosed so that no part of the machinery can be seen moving, and to the ordinary spectator the action of the wheels is a mystery.

Cycles to carry more than one person are soon to be made in a great variety of styles, and whole families will be able to make journeys on the private vehicle as they formerly did in the old family coach. In this case, however, each individual member will have to contribute a little of the motive power. The tandems have been so popular the past season that manufacturers could not make enough to supply the demand, and now there is a decided call for triplets and even sextuplets. The latter were manufactured at first as a novelty and for racing, but the manufacturers find that their appearance has actually created a demand for them.

The tricycles and four-wheel machines have been improved to the point of perfection, and no one need feel any fear of operating them for the pleasure of the ride and for the good of the exercise. They run almost as easily as the bicycles and tandems, but nearly all danger is eliminated. One does not have to learn to ride them, for there is no balancing feat to be accomplished. While they may appear too tame for the ordinary youth of the land, they are peculiarly fitted to those whose age forces them to the consideration of accidents.

In improving the bicycle, and all of its variations, the manufacturers have been forced to study with no little anxiety two special parts of the machines, and, while distinct improvements have been made in each this year, we are still far from reaching perfection. The pneumatic tire has not by any means been invented yet that will defy all punctures, and until such a tire has been found bicycling will have its serious drawbacks. Tires, however, will be made more puncture proof than ever next summer, and many of them will have an outside layer of material that will resist any ordinary sharp piece of stone or metal. The manufacturers will not guarantee them as puncture proof, but merely maintain that they are as near that as present circumstances will permit.

The saddle is the next important part of the machine that has exhausted the patience of inventors. The right saddle has not yet been made. There are many that are such great improvements over the old-fashioned hard saddle that one does not feel like complaining, but truth compels every rider to acknowledge that he is still looking forward to the perfected saddle. It must come in time; no one doubts that, but it is slow in getting here. At present half the trouble and inconvenience of riding is due to the saddle—the saddle that is too hard, too springy, too large or small, or too unsuited in every way. The number of new saddles that will be tested and experimented with next season will be legion, and of them it is hoped that at least one will prove successful.

When we pass from the bicycle to the horseless carriage in a study of our modern methods of travel, we bring into consideration an entirely new factor. It is true that bicycles and tandems have been invented to run by motive power other than the human legs, such as gasoline, steam and electricity, but they will never be popular. The rider who is young and daring enough to learn to balance himself on a bicycle will not submit to the propulsion of his machine by a motor. It is the exercise and the sense of muscular movement and development that makes half the charm of this sport. Those who want motor power to move them will not ride bicycles. They will demand a carriage, with all the luxury and conveniences that term signifies, and they will have provided for them the modern horseless vehicle that is propelled by agencies other than human.

The horseless carriage is still in the embryonic stage, but it is evolving from it so rapidly that we may soon expect to see it a common mode of conveyance. In France, where the country roads are excellent, it has attained a degree of popularity not known in this country, but recent trials and races with the carriages in New York and Chicago show that they are receiving attention here. Several firms are now engaged in making horseless carriages in the United States, and several hundred of these will be turned out this winter. The demand for them is influenced a great deal by the uncertainty attached to their practicalness and to the condition of our country roads. Road making and road improving have made tremendous strides, but we are still far behind Europe in this respect, and we need more good roads before the horseless carriages will become as popular as abroad. We are in a fair way to accomplish this, and the sooner it is done the better it will be for all classes.

HEALTH HINTS.

It is better to use flannel in applying a hot fomentation and also to place a layer of dry flannel next the skin. This affords a little time to get accustomed to the heat and a higher temperature can be borne than if the moist cloth is brought directly in contact with the surface.

A mixture of prepared carbolic acid and glycerine forms a good germicide and something of the sort should be in every home. Scarcely a day passes when some member of the household does not receive a cut or scratch or slight abrasion of the skin. Into this opening disease germs are liable to enter and the simple precaution of rubbing the spot with this preparation may prevent serious illness.

Too careful attention cannot be paid to the health of children during the years of physical development. An English physician says on this point: "Those who are intrusted with the care of the young of both sexes should remember that the education of the mind is a lifelong process; there is no need of hurry. The development of the body is strictly limited to a certain period of existence and becomes finally and irrevocably arrested at a given date." Here is a truth worth considering by parents and teachers who are disposed to push young people too rapidly in their studies at the expense of their bodily well-being.

The habit of dressing too warmly within doors in the winter season is earnestly deprecated by physicians. The temperature of modern houses and offices is usually about seventy degrees, which is summer heat. Yet both sexes select thick flannels and heavy dresses and coats for house wear and then go out into an atmosphere many degrees colder with little additional protection, especially for the feet. This is a fruitful source of colds. With present facilities for heating our houses we need not follow the customs of our forefathers in wearing heavy clothing indoors in winter, We need to adapt our wearing apparel to the changed conditions which we meet in going suddenly from furnace heated apartments into the freezing cold without.

Against the use of narcotics for inducing sleep Mrs. Phelps-Ward protests in McClure's Magazine in this vigorous fashion:

Avoid dependence upon narcotics as you would that circle in the "Inferno" where the winds blow the lost spirit about forever, and toss him to and fro—returning on his course and driven back—forever. Take the amount of sleep that God allows you and go without what he denies, but fly from drugs as you would from that poison of the Borgias which cunningly selected the integrity of the brain on which to feed. Starve for sleep if you must, die for lack of it if you must, I am almost prepared to say accept the delirium which marks the extremity of fate in this land of despair, but scorn the habit of using anodynes as you hope for healing and value reason.

SELF-CONTROL.

In an excellent article in the New Crusade the writer asks what can be done at the moment when a child who has lost control of himself in an access of rage lies kicking and screaming on the floor. In reply she quotes these suggestions of a prominent kindergartner:

Shall we punish him? As well put out fire with kerosene. Shall we reason with him? As well reason with Vesuvius in full flow. Shall we try to soothe him with kind words and caresses? As well pat a cyclone on the back and coax it to be still. No; I assert boldly that the only thing to be done at this juncture is to let the child alone, to leave the room entirely.

After the outburst is over, what shall be done? Obviously find out the cause of the disease if possible, and, if we be the offenders, repent of it in anguish and bitterness and strive to cast out the devils which we ourselves invited in.

In the first place—and this, I contend, is not weakness, but common sense—try not to enter into controversies with him, avoid provocation and endeavor to ward off absolute issues. Distract his attention; try to get the desired result in some other way, but give no room for an outburst of temper if it can be avoided.

Don't fret him with groundless prohibitions; don't speak to him quickly and sharply, and never meet passion with passion. If you punish him when you are angry, he clearly sees that he, because he is small and weak, is being chastised for the same fault which you, being large and strong, may commit with impunity.

After one of these outbursts of temper, don't reprove and admonish him until he is rested. The demon has come down like a hurricane upon the waters of his spirit, and the noise of the waves must be stilled before the mind can listen to reason. When the sun comes out, after the storm, is the time to note wreckage and take measures for future safety. Select some quiet, happy hour, then, in which you can gently warn him of his besetting sin and teach him to begin to guard against it. Until this time comes, and he is in a condition for counsel and punishment, an atmosphere of grief and disapproval may be made to encompass him, which he will feel more keenly than spoken words. And when the time for punishment does come, let us try to make it, as far as possible, the natural penalty, that which is the inevitable effect of given cause; for, as "face answereth to face in water," so the feeling of justice within the child to the eternal justice of world law.

Finally, let us be patient but firm, and let slip no opportunity for teaching self control and giving strength of will.

Closet and Altar

Begin each day by tarrying before God and letting him touch you. Take time to meet God.

The world proposes rest by the removal of a burden. The Redeemer gives rest by giving us the spirit and power to bear the burden. The rest of Christ is not that of torpor, but of harmony. It is not of refusing the struggle, but conquering in it. Not resting from duty, but finding rest in duty. —F. W. Robertson.

Help us, O Father, when the world is pressing
On our frail hearts that faint without their Friend;
Help us, O Father! let thy constant blessing
Strengthen our weakness till the joyful end.
—W. H. Hurlbut.

The world, with its duties, its strifes and efforts, its sorrows and cares, all melts away in the beauty of a life near to Christ, for he becomes an ever present reality to you and his countenance like that of a friend whose face is well known. Your existence merges into that of a higher being, and you follow him steadfastly, instead of groping and stumbling along by yourself. Faith in Christ places you in a higher region of living. You have new associates, new ambitions and a life perennially renewed.—Carl G. Doney.

To abide in love is to abide in thoughts of God's love, in the memory and consciousness of Christ's love, in the sense of one's own unworthiness and in the renunciation of self, in the rejection of selfish pleasure and advantage and the study of the true happiness of others, in intercession, in the Holy Spirit, in the faith that discerns a present God and knows how to discover the relations of every creature to God. Especially is it to abide in the great thought that Christ tasted death for every man and that your life is to be an embodiment of the gospel for every creature.—George Bowen.

The day is done; the weary day of thought and toil is past.
Soft falls the twilight cool and gray on the tired earth at last.
By wisest teachers wearied, by gentlest friends oppressed,
In thee alone, the soul, outworn, refreshment finds, and rest.

Bend, gracious Spirit from above, like these o'er-arching skies,
And to thy firmament of love lift up these longing eyes;
And folded by thy sheltering hand, in refuge still and deep,
Let blessed thoughts from thee descend, as drop the dews of sleep.
—Eliza Scudder.

Eternal God, we cannot stand in the presence of thy love and favor without bumbling ourselves because of our ingratitude. We are full of doubt notwithstanding thy promises, and ever careless and indifferent, and slack in zeal. Lighten our eyes that the glorious life of our Saviour may shine more vividly before them, and give us grace, we beseech thee, to follow his example as thou hast given grace to the many who are now with thee in Paradise. By all the faith in the past give us more faith, and by all the prayerfulness in the past increase in us the power for prayer, for the sake of thy Son, Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE INHERITANCE OF GOOD.

God's in his heaven,

Pippa's refrain as she passes through her one holiday of all the year has brought joy and gladness, hope and comfort to many. Had Browning written but the one poem, Pippa Passes, he would not only have proved himself poet, but Christian poet as well. I sometimes wonder, when I read and hear so much about the inheritance of evil, if the writers and speakers believe that God is dead and that good is so much less mighty than evil. It is written, "Adam was the son of God." If we are the sons of Adam born in sin, we are also the sons of God and Godhood, goodness, is transmittable as well as deviltry and wickedness.

Upon the babe is visited the mistakes and sins of its immediate parents. Not only is the girl mother condemned but the innocent child as well. Childless fathers and mothers when importuned to give one of these little ones a home often make this reply: I would do so were it not for its inheritance of sin. Why not also believe in the inheritance of good? Possibly but one remove and the child's lineage is as pure and good as their own. May not the virtues of the grandparents and great-grandparents be a rich inheritance of good for these children, who through no fault of theirs have a stain upon their name? I cannot but believe that He who notes the sparrow's fall will take an especial thought and care for them. There are also noted instances where children coming into the world with a long line of inheritance of evil, given love and home, have become good men and women. Blessed are the fathers and mothers who for love's sake and in his name hath redeemed these little ones from the consequences of sin.

But to come into the homes where children have been born to the parents. Why be unduly anxious about the inheritance of evil? "Is God's arm shortened that he cannot save, or his ear heavy, that he cannot hear," when we pray "Deliver us from evil?" Is this the one evil from which human nature cannot be delivered? To my thinking it is better to choke out the bad by the cultivation of the good than to give such prominence to the bad that the very distinction given adds to the probabilities of its continuance.

Let us fathers and mothers be as wise as we may in the care of our children, not disregarding known inheritance of evil, but also remembering gratefully their inheritance of good, and taking more thought and care that the environment be all that is good, beautiful and true, thus working together with God, trustfully, hopefully, faithfully. OTHER PEOPLE'S PILLOWS.

I had such a handsome pillow given me for my baby's crib. It was plump and well proportioned. The case was linen, fine and cool, and had a ruffle all around it of beautiful embroidery. It was not altogether a show pillow, either, but was intended for use, my friend said; and so nightly I took supreme satisfaction in laying a certain curly, golden head in the center of the frilled square, with a lingering glance at the dainty picture as I turned away.

But here the pride and pleasure ended, for no sooner had the Rock-a-by lady from Hush-a-by Street

than the small head was down in some remote corner of the crib, while the pillow lay alone, stately, and almost without a wrinkle. No matter how many times during the night I rearranged that two-year-old "in good form" she would wriggle off again with the utmost perversity. At last I reached the conclusion that if she would be restless and unappreciative she must bear the penalty and go without a pillow altogether, and this one should be kept for the daytime.

But one night I tried that pillow myself, and before morning my views were changed. I found the article in question most uncomfortable. It was too square and too plump, and it refused obstinately to adapt itself in any particular. Before midnight it was gracing the footboard, while I was remorsefully laying the curly head upon a little, old, soft pillow, a relic of baby days.

Perhaps it was through the unaccustomed wakefulness which followed this episode for an hour or two that I fell into a train of disconnected and rather hazy moralizing. The thought of the little, helpless, speechless mortals who form so large a proportion of this world's population weighed upon me. It is not only the presumptuous sins against them, but "who can understand his errors?!" Even our love may be wrongly expressed. The very pillows we give them may turn to their disadvantage. What tact and judgment and quick instinct are required in the care of a little child! Above all, what a necessity to "put yourself in his place," to keep pride and foolish vanity and all selfishness entirely out of consideration, to try the pillows!

Then my mind went out into the wider field of humanity in general. There is an old fable about the exchange of burdens, when each mortal was allowed to cast his own particular pain or trial into a hugh pile from which he might select some other burden to take its place. We are all familiar with this story. We have been taught, and generally have come to believe, that each man's cross is best for him alone. But other people's pillows! The special blessings and fortunate circumstances which appear to us in the lives of our neighbors, and which, perhaps, we have not, the riches, the loves, the fame, the abounding health of our friends or our enemies, what effect do they have upon us?

I think we are sometimes inclined to overestimate them, as I did my baby's pillow. We look at the handsome proportions, the fine linen, the decorations, and wonder how those to whom they belong can ever be restless or dissatisfied We criticise and judge the possessors because they seem to take too little pleasure in the things which look so fine to us. And yet we have never tried them. We might find unexpected flaws if the same experience should come to us. The heart knoweth its own bitterness not only, but its own joy. The joy may be all it seems, or less. Each one knows for himself.

So far I thought, then I grew drowsy and dropped to sleep with these words lingering in my brain, "Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment."

A CORRECTION.

We were erroneously informed that the course of afternoon lectures by Prof. E. Charlton Black were being given in Newton instead of under the auspices of the Home Department of the Cantabrigia Club of Cambridge. Mrs. E. H. Cobb, the chairman, adds: "The object is to meet a need felt by many of our most thoughtful mothers, viz., to use the gems of our best authors for the home culture of children. From his high scholarship and wide experience Professor Black was thought to be the best person to present in attractive form the high ideals of our best writers, and to show how these could be used as powerful incentives for the culture of children and youth. As the method of the course is a novel one, the chairman would be happy to welcome representatives from other clubs desiring to study the plan at her home, 7 Avon Street, Cambridge, where the lectures are held on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, at three o'clock in the afternoon."

"It's all right, Mary," he said, patiently. "Go into politics and run for office if you want to. But remember one thing, the cartoonists 'll be after you as soon as you're a candidate."

"I don't care."

"And they'll put your picture in the paper with your hair out of curl and your hat on crooked."

"Do you think they would do that?" she inquired, apprehensively.

"Of course. And they'll make your Paris gowns look like ten-cent calico, and say that your sealskin coat is imitation."

"William," she said, after a thoughtful pause, "I guess I'll just stay right here and make home happy."

Dr. Storrs Among His Own People.

A Familiar and Graphic Account of Pastoral and Personal Traits.

By Rev. Edwin H. Byington, Associated with Dr. Storrs as Pastor of the Branch of the Church of the Pilgrims.

My pen refuses to attempt a formal analysis of Dr. Storrs's personality, but if you will permit me to chat about him in a simple, everyday sort of a way I shall enjoy telling what manner of man his people find him to be. I am not speaking in these words for Dr. Storrs. I have not "interviewed" him. He does not know I am writing this article. These are simply my impressions gleaned during the years of my association with him and the church.

I shall not dare express all the love and admiration we feel for him, because he is himself so averse to public praise. It is one of the unwritten rules of the Church of the Pilgrims that no member shall laud him, except behind his back. The people of the church have faced a real difficulty in planning for this jubilee; they shrink from giving Dr. Storrs discomfort by abundance of praise and honor, but equally unwilling are they to refrain from expressing their heartfelt appreciation of his faithful and splendid ministry.

When the New York Presbyterian Synod, meeting in Brooklyn last month, presented to him an address of congratulation and appreciation of his spirit and ability, he began his reply by saying: "When this paper was being read, so tender and so strong in feeling and expression, I asked myself whether I could recognize the person. I can honestly say that I do not think I know him." This was not simply a bit of repartee, but a spontaneous revelation of his spirit. A local paper, commenting editorially on this incident, said, and correctly: "The spirit of his response to the compliments heaped upon him showed, more than all his intellectual attainments, why men are drawn to him. It is pleasant to think that before long the whole city will unite in expressing its opinion of this great preacher and humble Christian man. If we mistake not, he would prefer to be known first by the latter title."

It is not that Dr. Storrs is unresponsive to love and appreciation—far from that—but he places a low estimate on himself, has no appetite for adulation, and is possessed of a certain shyness which makes him shrink when his own life and labors become the object of public applause. From conviction, too, he objects to the parading of his personal life before the public. Its outflow he freely gives to his fellowmen, but the secret springs he insists shall not be uncovered. The delights of his home, the communings of his heart, the wrestlings in his study do not belong to the world.

His position with reference to the church is similar. In a sermon on the fortieth anniversary of his pastorate he said: "A certain reserve has therefore characterized our church, such as used to be more common in churches than it has been of late. There has never been felt here the passion for publicity which finds the church life most exhilarating when public mention of it is frequent, to which the church appears walking victoriously in high places when the newspapers are occupied with what is said or done within it. We have preferred to live in the privacy secured us and to do our work in our special sphere without proclamation." His joy is in the church's achievements, not in the public appreciation of them. He consents, for co-operation's sake, to send the statistics of the church for denominational purposes and conscientiously aims to make them accurate, but I think the whole thing is distasteful to him.

DR. STORRS AT THE AGE OF TWENTY-NINE.

Not long ago the pastor of a prominent church arranged a series of sermons by eminent men of different denominations. He invited each to expatiate on the merits and achievements of his own branch of the Christian Church. Dr. Storrs was invited to wave the Congregational banner. Though second to none in denominational zeal, loyalty and pride, he replied that he was not accustomed to deliver such addresses, but, if desired, would gladly come and preach a simple gospel sermon. And he did.

One of the most notable elements of Dr. Storrs's ministerial life is the exalted conception he holds of his duty to his own church, the Church of the Pilgrims. In this he is a striking example to the young men of the ministry who aspire to a far-reaching influence. To them this is often the grand purpose of life, while the care of the local church, if not drudgery, is commonplace and secondary. Not thus is it with Dr. Storrs. His supreme ambition seems to be to care faithfully for the flock committed to him. Ask him to leave his church prayer meeting to address an audience ten or twenty times larger, and you will receive little encouragement. Urge his discontinuance of a church service because the attendance is small and the effort seemingly wasted, and he will smite you with his answer. He is not a man given to excuses, but he is apt to explain any absence from his own pulpit, feeling that such an act without sufficient and compelling reason would be a breach of trust.

Books he has published, addresses he has made, but they have not been allowed to encroach on the time and strength due his people. Far more are the unwritten books stored in his mind and the unuttered orations his lips have checked, because he thought their production might have interfered with his duty to his own church. What of world wide influence he possesses has not come by diverting his energies into distant channels but by an absolute devotion to this portion of the Lord's vineyard.

To each duty he gives not only the allotted time but the utmost care. Preparation for church services is neither short nor careless. He preaches without notes, but never extemporaneously. Early in the week his subjects are chosen. They have the best of the week and all the week. He spends his mornings in his study, which is as impregnable as Gibraltar. In like manner his Saturday evenings are guarded. He accepts no invitations for those hours. For a night he must be "alone," before he comes with a message from his God to his people.

His devotion to his own church is deep, but it has not narrowed him. All know his great interest in foreign missions, but few realize the breadth of his spirit in relation to local Congregationalism—a breadth few ministers attain. Six months after his installation Dr. Storrs and his people approved the withdrawal of a group of his strongest men that they might start another Congregational church within half a mile of the Church of the Pilgrims. For half a century that has been his attitude, encouraging and even commanding some of his choicest spirits to leave him that they might plant or foster new enterprises, and inspiring large contributions for the sustenance of feebler neighboring congregations.

People often ask why Congregationalism has flourished in Brooklyn, while so feeble in New York city. Other factors played a part, but this is the main one: the leadership in New York fifty years ago viewed with jealousy new enterprises and permitted them to perish, but Brooklyn leadership battled for them. Not that the pastor and people of the Church of the Pilgrims founded all our twenty churches, but in the first year of his pastorate it was established as a vital principle of Brooklyn Congregationalism that new churches should not only be tolerated but planted and sustained. That spirit has continued to this day in the Church of the Pilgrims and throughout Brooklyn Congregationalism, and is the secret of our growth. Had Dr. Storrs advocated a different policy, his own church would have been larger and stronger, but where would have been our score of churches with their 13,000 members?

He has had also an influence in the community outside of church life. This he has not attained by being a perpetual fault-finder. There are men to whom good citizenship and assault on civic leaders are synonymous, who account themselves most public spirited when berating and belittling the city of their choice, and who believe that criticism is the best way of uplifting the community. Dr. Storrs is not of this class. At times, as when ballot box corruption in this county was smitten a few years ago, his eloquence he used as a veritable scourge. But this was an exception. His delight has been to fulfill faithfully all the duties devolving upon American citizenship, and then to throw himself heartily into all good movements, civic, social, charitable, which have been inaugurated for the welfare of the community. He showed himself a splendid leader in the presidency of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society for many years, in his presidency of the Long Island Historical Society for the past quarter-century, and in other movements which he has originated or led.

But marked as are his qualities of leadership, his greatest influence has been in inspiring and encouraging other men in their efforts. Many noble enterprises, in the conduct of whose affairs he has had no direct part, have grown into large spheres of usefulness because of his enthusiastic and unfaltering encouragement. To him his fellow-citizens turn instinctively for counsel and co-operation. Efforts which his disapproval or even silence would have crushed in their infancy today are flourishing. Leaders for righteousness can ever count on the support of one mighty man of valor. From the pulpit and the purse of the Church of the Pilgrims often has come a grand Amen, which has inspired to new and successful endeavor the leaders of many a struggling cause. By quiet, personal encouragement, rather than by public invective, he has exerted a commanding and uplifting influence in the community.

If I should be asked the keynote of Dr. Storrs's religious life, I should say that it was an absolute and unfaltering confidence in the supreme Ruler of the universe. His is a triumphant sort of faith. He is not a pessimist; his trust in Jesus Christ banishes pessimism as the sun the darkness. Neither is he an optimist, gilding everything and refusing to recognize difficulties and dangers. He looks on both sides. He recognizes the worst in the world, but that does not shake his belief that the Lord God omnipotent reigneth; that the most merciful Father has neither forgotten nor forsaken; that God cannot fail; that the ultimate victory will be his, and that it will come in his good time. In a recent sermon on the patience of God, compared with the impatience of man, he said, with intense and thrilling emphasis: "He should not be impatient who is keeping step with the omnipotent God." Each Lord's Day in public worship at the Church of the Pilgrims is repeated the Apostles' Creed, and his entire ministry has been an undaunted and triumphant proclamation: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, his only son, our Lord."

This spirit determines largely, I imagine, his position on such vexed questions as the higher criticism. He does not urge the higher critics on as creators of a better faith. He does not assail them, wishing to rescue the Bible from possible destruction. He believes the Word of God will endure. Men may come and men may go, and so with theories and arguments and books, but he never doubts that God's Holy Word will go on forever. Whatever his definition of "inspiration," I think it must contain the word imperishable. So is he confident concerning the Church of God. For a time, and in places, coldness may creep in and error enervate, but he believes the sweep is onward and upward. He does not tremble for Christ's kingdom. He is not afraid for God.

Not only in his thought, but in his daily life, does he rest in this confidence. Whether or not he ever has seen the following lines he certainly lives them:

> The world is wide
> In time and tide,
> And God is guide.
> Then, do not hurry.
> That man is blest
> Who does his best
> And leaves the rest:
> Then, do not worry.

A friend of fifty years' standing and more said of him, "I never have known him to hurry." Coming to Brooklyn a frail young man, he has outlived most of his associates and today in public address has a forceful energy that few younger men possess. Had he been given to hurrying and worrying he would scarcely have passed the quarter century mark in the pastorate. His is a calmness arising from a serene and sublime faith in his Maker. To him he can leave the results, and to him also he can leave, in tranquil temper, the many opportunities for which he has no time nor strength, and which he must permit to pass by.

Strange as it may seem to say it of so fruitful a life, Dr. Storrs appears to be satisfied with doing a few things. He does not attempt to read all books, nor to master all subjects. In ministerial gatherings often he prefaces his discussion of a topic by stating that he is not familiar with the book or theme. Thoroughness is the dominating element of his scholarship—a thoroughness which strives for absolute accuracy in details, and at the same time is eager to catch the spirit of the age, the man, the movement under consideration. Many of his lectures, addresses and orations have been published, and his friends are anxious that he should publish a volume of sermons. Certainly the Christian public would rejoice if he could be persuaded to do this. He is very conscientious in attending ministerial and ecclesiastical gatherings, and whether he speaks or sits an attentive listener to others his presence is a source of gratification. There is a certain reserve about him, but he is ever cordial and kindly in his greetings, and exceedingly appreciative of others' efforts. No ministerial gathering seems complete without him.

I should be delighted to speak of the charming life in Dr. Storrs's home circle, but cannot without taking unfair advantage of the privileges accorded me there. I will, however, take the liberty of saying that in this home is fulfilled the sentiment expressed to me years ago by a good woman in the words: "It is not enough that the husband love his wife; he should also cherish her."

DR. STORRS AT FIFTY-ONE.

And I will also take the liberty of quoting a few words written about Mrs. Storrs by one who has been a member of the Church of the Pilgrims for over fifty years: "With Dr. Storrs's name we may couple that of her who has been at the same time the joy, the comfort and companion of his life's journey. No one who has known the helpful charm of her personality, the precious comfort of her sympathy, the healing touch of her sweet and wholesome life can separate her name from his. The generous mother heart and the strong, well poised mind have been swift to lavish their wealth, not only in the home, where her children 'rise up and call her blessed,' but wherever another has sat sorrowing or alone. Her tenderness has brightened days otherwise dark with the shadows of old griefs, and her sweet little verses or couplets, accompanying some dainty gift, have warmed hearts which loneliness had chilled." Of their children one tarried in the earthly home only a few years. Mrs. Packard, whose husband was the late Prof. Lewis R. Packard of Yale College, with her daughter share the Brooklyn home. Another daughter is the wife of Rev. Edward B. Coe, D. D, of the Collegiate Church in New York, and a third is the wife of Rev. Philip M. Washburn of Colorado Springs. The grandchildren in these homes are a constant source of comfort and joy to their grandparents, who already have celebrated their golden wedding.

Admirable as are his sermons, even more notable is his conduct of public worship. He enters the church and moves to his seat as one entering a sacred place. Not more reverently could the high priest have entered the holy of holies. His first words are low, addressing and adoring in humble awe the Holy One of Israel. He speaks in a perfectly natural voice, yet one hushed as in the presence of sovereign and celestial majesty. It is a time for worship. The hearts of the people are uplifted, as he approaches the throne of grace boldly, but with the boldness of the angels bowing before the Lamb, and of the seraphim veiling their faces. The congregation feel that they are on holy ground. Then is answered the petition Dr. Storrs so often utters, that "this may be to us none other but the house of God, and this the gate of heaven." It is not the wondrous flow of language, it is the spirit with which he addresses the Lord of lords and his adorable Son.

So all through the worship until the benediction. Never have I heard another pronounce the benediction as he does. It is not the formal announcement of the close of the service; it is not only part of the worship, but it is the grandest moment of the hour. No matter how glorious and thrilling his discourse, his benediction rises higher. It is a benediction indeed. What wonder that the people pass out quietly at the close of the service, for the spirit of the benediction is still upon them.

Most of all the church loves the communion service. Dr. Storrs makes it so sacred and solemn, and yet so simple and joyous. Often, as on that first day of the week long ago, at the blessing and breaking of the bread, the holden eyes are opened and they look into the face of the Saviour.

This reverent spirit does not draw pastor and people away from each other, but brings them into a very tender fellowship. I never shall forget an incident that occurred the first Sunday I attended the Church of the Pilgrims. At its close a few went forward to greet him. With us was a little girl, one of the children of the church. As he was welcoming stranger and friend the little maiden stood near him, apparently unnoticed. Without saying anything he quietly bent over, took the fair, round face between his hands, and kissed her. Then he went on with his salutations, while the child stood contentedly by his side till her father had finished his conversation with Dr. Storrs.

Not soon can any one forget those Sabbath scenes when this man of God takes in his arms the little babes brought to the church and baptizes them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Sweeter almost even than this is the service held the first Sunday morning of each January, when he calls before him the baptized children of the church who have reached the age of seven. The little ones come eagerly up the aisles with radiant faces. Gathering them about the font where they were baptized he gives to each in the name of the church a beautiful Bible, a bouquet of flowers and a "holy kiss," and then offers in their behalf a fervent and tender prayer. Is it a wonder that members of the church moving to other places sometimes cannot be induced to change their church relations, lest their children should be deprived of this their spiritual birthright? Let me close by quoting Dr. Storrs's words about this service: "In not a few instances a child dying in faith and hope has wished the last words read in its hearing, or read by its coffin, to be read from its beloved 'church Bible.' I only wonder that the custom observed here for many years, and which will here be as permanent as the church, has not been elsewhere and widely adopted."

Dr. Storrs as a Preacher.

By Rev. A. J. Lyman, D. D.

Any words of public tribute to a living leader, who is also a near neighbor and a revered and beloved personal friend, must of necessity maintain a certain delicacy of reserve To no man now living in the ministry does the present writer owe so much as to Rev. Dr. Storrs. Coming to Brooklyn twenty-three years ago, a novice in his calling, he found in Dr. Storrs not only his nearest Congregational neighbor, but the wisest of counselors and a most constantly considerate friend, whose endowment of intellectual splendor only set in higher relief his patient and faithful kindness to a junior in the ministry.

From such a junior, therefore, any words concerning Dr. Storrs as a preacher which shall not seem conspicuously indelicate and obtrusive must be simple and loving words Without critical parade or vain comparison of various homiletical styles and ideals, they must simply attest the universal acknowledgment of Dr. Storrs's supremacy in the field to which he has been appointed.

But we must use that word appointed in this instance with a distinguishing emphasis, for there grows upon any one who for a long series of years has at short range watched Dr. Storrs in the exercise of his calling a profound impression that the supreme Spirit which both kindles and consecrates human genius created and commissioned him to be exactly what he is, placed him where he is, adjusted his unique and resplendent gifts to a specific opportunity and demand. It is as though some far foreseeing "angel of the churches" had strung the ancestral bow for him and brought it brightened to his hand. It is true that a strenuous and patient self-culture, a valiant and silent fidelity to lofty ideals, have helped to unfold his powers, but those powers had only to unfold in order perfectly to match with their environment and their errand. This throws the entire estimate of Dr. Storrs's career into a more delicate and deeper scale, while it does not impair the sense of his own voluntary part in it. Dr. Storrs does not try to shine; he shines without trying. With him the spontaneous is the appropriate and the artistic, and this suggests not so much the dexterities of professional talent as the adequacy of a divine commission.

In Dr. Storrs many felicities blend. There is, for example, as has been suggested, a felicity of heredity. His roots are in the subsoil of the noblest New England Congregationalism, and he is heir both in name and in temper to its most lofty and finished ministerial traditions. Then, too, there is a felicity of environment. Coming from New England he came to a new New England in Brooklyn, where a "Church of the Pilgrims," one of the amplest, stanchest, grandest churches that Congregationalism ever gave to America, seemed founded to fit him, was ready to welcome him, furnished him with both arena and stimulus; near enough to the metropolis to share its mighty life, and yet far enough on its margin to escape its distracting temporalities. Here the New England granite could become incandescent without losing anything of its firmness. History has occasionally exhibited such a kindling of intellectual radiance at the point where the rigid and massive faith of an older generation is brought within the blaze of new scenes and new times. Then there has been, also, the felicity of physique, of manner and voice, all matching with each other, and matching with him and with his royal church and its place in the city. Then, finally, we behold this crowning and magnificent felicity of five continuous decades of years in one pastoral relationship, a period blessed with almost uninterrupted health, regal with splendid toil, a history of silver mellowing into gold, where the affluence of power had time to attain its full fruition and a local pulpit could become a throne of national influence and renown.

Dr. Storrs's style, therefore, is in part the natural product of these blending felicities, as it is also the product of diligent study and endeavor. His style is himself. It could not be different from what it is without insincerity. Its symmetry and rhythm of intellectual order and grace, its instant co-ordination of many details in a just perspective, as well as its recurrent flash of illustrative fire, are as inevitable, though unconscious to himself, in a chance conversation or a casual letter as in the formal oration. It is therefore shallow judgment to call Dr. Storrs a "rhetorician" of whatever distinction, for this word suggests something artificial and assumed, and in his style there is nothing artificial or assumed. No man has been truer to himself, the self God meant him to be. His style is simply the processional of his entire manhood.

This, at least, may be said without any approach to effusive eulogy that Dr. Storrs is the greatest master ever in the American pulpit of a style which since the days of Cicero has been one of the three or four greatest styles of spoken speech in the world—serious, stately, splendid, not without, however, a hint of humor and even gayety on the margin of it, bearing along all sorts of historic and literary treasure, and yet with a constant logical unity and momentum beneath, upon which these various enrichments fit as easily as the banners fit a marching army. Such a style has been likened to the sweep of a flowing river. But perhaps the branching and unfolding tree is the truer symbol—one of his own great New England elms, for instance, solid and graceful, lifted naturally from the soil, developing part from part, all whose structure strains toward the final volutes, if one may use a pedantic word; whose vital impulse incessantly ramifies, yet without losing its integrity, bent before all things upon symmetry, and insisting to its uttermost tossing tip of blossoming spray that the unity shall dominate the variety.

One can imagine the amused and deprecatory smile with which Dr. Storrs himself would probably read such a sentence as this from his younger brother, but just now he is, as the politicians term it, "in the hands of his friends," and he must let them have their way and their "say."

Dr. Storrs, therefore, so representing the felicitous interplay of many forces in the past and present, becomes naturally our supreme orator of occasions. Indeed, among the many beauties of his speech, the supreme beauty is always his absolute appropriateness, the instinctive and unerring correspondence between his mind and the spirit of the hour, as though the occasion itself became the orator, so that what is most natural for him to say seems always the fittest thing to be said. "Is enim est eloquens," writes Cicero, "qui et humilia subtiliter, et magna graviter, et mediocria temperate potest dicere."

How such a mind and such a style will relate themselves to the function of preaching is a question whose answer is known of all men. What Dr. Storrs is as an orator he is as a preacher, foremost in his field and that field one of the greatest. He is not less a preacher than an orator, if any one cares to make the distinction. For the arena of the Christian preacher is so wide and grand that in it the loftiest oratorical style is as much at home as is the conversational simplicity of a Spurgeon or the dramatic passion of a Whitfield.

It is a mistake to fix upon this or that mode of speech as being specifically adapted to the presentation of that gospel which is the gospel of the Lord of the whole earth. St. Paul and St. John are together truer products of the gospel and better preachers of it than two St. Johns or two St. Pauls. In preaching the simple homily is legitimate and appropriate, the shortest Saxon, the evangelist's breathless appeal, stories like Guthrie's, the terrific anathema of Knox, or the "dona lachrymarum" of which the old fathers spoke; but so also appropriate is the richest toned and stateliest rhythm of eloquence. The wide learning, secular as well as sacred, arranged in order, held in perfect remembrance and lit by a kind of vital glow—the march of an argument which summons all precedent and illumines by all example—a sense of distinction in metaphor which recalls the splendor of Burke, a genius for assonance and cadence in diction and ideas as well, imparting to spoken speech the moving beauty and the thrill of music—all this fused in the fervor of a supreme conviction and urged with the ultimate stroke of the roused will, proclaiming the truth of the centuries, the truth of God—this style of speech also finds its largest and most congenial field in the preaching of Christ's gospel. And this is why Dr. Storrs holds, in one of the very noblest forms of utterance known in these Christian centuries, the supreme place in the American pulpit.

It is easy, of course, to say that the method of such a preacher is not the best model for a man who is altogether different from him; that it is not, perhaps, the most "taking" style with the average crowd; that it is not best adapted to a mere pulpit performer's "lightning changes." It is not the best style to air novelties in, or in which to attack institutions, or expound heresies, or push an erratic propaganda. One may even very freely admit that it is not the best style for the camp meeting or the college classroom; certainly not the best vehicle of expression for the random archery of current speculation or the critical persiflage of the hour. That is all true, but you might as well say that the organ is not the best instrument for a drum corps or a dance hall. A man cannot be at once Milton and Montaigne. The sweep of an eagle's flight does not suit the capricious zigzag of a humming bird. The humming bird has its place, and Dr. Storrs has his, and the glory and value of his life is in the fact that he has so completely and nobly been exactly what nature and grace intended him to be.

For Dr. Storrs has preached the irenic Christian faith, the central and constant faith of the Christian ages. While not called to be a pioneer in the side issues of theological speculation, his influence has never been theologically reactionary. He has dwelt upon what is permanent and perennial. He has lifted up Christ in the light of all the ages and of this age as well. The glow at the center of his ministry is the glory of the Son of God. He has not cared much for polemics or for provincialisms, whether "old school" or "new school." He has been enamored of the majesty, the variety, the beauty of the great main scroll of Christian revelation. To set this forth has been the constant passion of all his royal powers. Writer, orator, public leader, he has yet always been, and is first and foremost, a preacher. His temper has been conservative without being illiberal. He has illustrated that most glorious part of the past which deserves to remain, while on the other hand he has kept himself in sympathy with the soundest part of modern progress. What is the most striking thing in Dr. Storrs is this just balance of his mind. Eager students of modern ideas are not repelled by him, while the veterans hear in his speech also the trumpets of ancient days.

He comes to the close of this extraordinary half-century of ministry with his magnificent force not yet abated, one of the glories of our land and of the church, having been "faithful to that committed to his charge," always true to himself and to his intellectual and Christian mission in his time, and so winning from two generations of his countrymen and his associates in the ministry their admiring confidence and affectionate honor.

RALLY FOR THE ARMENIAN ORPHANS.

BY REV. CYRUS HAMLIN, D. D.

No more pressing cry of humanity for help can now be heard from any part of the world than the present appeal from Turkey. The number of houseless people whose breadwinners have been murdered and their houses "looted" and destroyed is estimated at three to four hundred thousand. They are looking forward with terror to the approach of winter. The suffering children can in part be saved. So many as can be gathered into orphanages will exchange the miserable damp dug-out, hunger, rags and filth and hopeless despair for a Christian home, striving for a Christian and useful life.

Mrs. Clara Lee of Marash is opening an orphanage for fifty girls for which money has been received from Germany, with promise of repeating it annually. Fifty hardly makes a visible diminution of the number of the sufferers. And then the boys are left in this unalleviated misery.

In the city of Malatia, where 1,500 men were killed, the number of orphans is 1,883 by careful count. If 75,000 men have been massacred, there must be at least 100,000 orphans. Here is a call for Christian benevolence to achieve one of its noblest works. If it cannot save the whole, it can save as many as it pleases. There are two very encouraging considerations:

1. There are many excellent Armenian women who have been educated in missionary seminaries who are now in great destitution and would be delighted to be employed to do the work and teaching in an orphanage.

2. The expense per scholar would be low. No plans have yet been sent, but a dollar a month would be enough for board and clothing. It is a rescue work and the style of living would be rescue style—cleanly, healthy, comfortable. "Blessed is the man, the woman, the child that considereth the poor." Let Christian benevolence arise and show the world what she can do.

Lexington, Oct. 3.

MORE ABOUT THE QUESTION OF COMITY.

In The Congregationalist of Oct. 22 there was published a letter of Rev. R. M. Tunnell, who, professing to raise "a question of comity," designed beyond doubt a vigorous assault upon Fairmount College. Its effect, however, was so fully negatived by the quotations, which the editors were fortunately able to make from some of his former communications pleading for the endowment of the institution as a college, that no reader will likely be influenced by his recent fulminations. "The points at issue" raised by the editorial comments upon his article merit general notice, and no officer of the Education Society has doubted that they would be presented for discussion sooner or later.

Assuming that the editorial reference to "schemes to build small colleges with gifts from the East in order to increase the local values of land" was in no sense directed against the officers of the Education Society or Fairmount College, we believe The Congregationalist voiced the universal sentiment of what should be, and practically has been, the general policy of the Education Society. In the first place it may be said that the directors and secretaries affirm, with more emphasis even than formerly, that, as a rule, only one college in a State should be fostered by Congregational benevolence. But it should not be forgotten that the Education Society never "plants" institutions, collegiate or academic, and does not even always aid the needy institutions which are planted under Congregational auspices, inasmuch as merely local or State considerations sometimes determine the approval of a Western institution by an association of churches. Recently the society declined to indorse or aid a second college in Nebraska commended by its State association; and within this calendar year the same action was taken by the directors in reference to the second college in South Dakota, whose application for assistance had been unanimously approved by the State association. An unvarying application of the rule of "only one college in a State" would in years gone by have excluded from the society's list such worthy colleges as Illinois, Ripon, Marietta, Oberlin and Drury. There will doubtless be an occasional departure from the general policy of the society in the future, for a rule that may be "wise" for the Congregational interests of Wyoming or North Dakota might be very unwise if made effective in California or Washington. The directors of the Education Society must have discretion as each new case or condition presents itself, and in the resolutions recognizing Fairmount as a college they expressly declared it to be an exceptional case.

In reference to the other point at issue, there can be but one general opinion. The society should not and does not admit to its list any institution not first approved by the churches of the vicinage or State. The institution (formerly called Fairmount Institute, now Fairmount College) always had the indorsement of the local and State associations, and still has—the latter not yet having considered the question of its becoming a college. The approval of the institution at the last annual meeting of the State association in May was not withheld, though it was known that a Freshman Class had been organized the previous year. The directors of the society realized the delicacy of approving the institution as a college, though, without intending any disregard of the courtesy due the State association, they felt justified by all the circumstances in not waiting for its special action upon what should be the rank of the institution.

Its location in the commercial metropolis of southwestern Kansas, which Mr. Tunnell described as a "graveyard of institutions," gives it special merit and claim to Christian benevolence as the one college which has survived, and its phenomenal growth is an unanswerable testimony in its favor. That it is not a rival, and will not be, of Washburn College may be judged from a letter written by Mr. George M. Herrick when Western secretary of the Education Society, but now president of Washburn College, in which he said: "There are strong arguments for making a college there. Washburn is not covering that field, and should not object if an institution is established there which will do the work. It is very improbable that Washburn can ever get many students or any financial aid from that region."

FRANK L. FERGUSON,
Field Secretary.

At the recent meeting of the Congregational Union of England and Wales a letter was formulated replying to one received from the Bishop of Peterborough, who has just been appointed Dr. Temple's successor as Bishop of London. In the reply the title "your lordship" occurred five times. A delegate questioned whether it was not somewhat inconsistent for Nonconformists to thus recognize the title of the Anglican prelate. Prin. A. M. Fairbairn of Mansfield College immediately arose and said, "Might I suggest that courtesy ought to be met with courtesy. It ill becomes us, as Christian gentlemen, to use any language save the language which is universally recognized. We compromise nothing by so doing."

The Conversation Corner.

NOW that we have disposed of the vacation photographs we are ready for those historical subjects, one being the Frigate Constitution. As she was the most famous ship of our early navy, we are glad to have in a compact form the principal facts about her career. This letter was written from a favorable place—close to the Kittery Navy Yard, where the old frigate is kept, and where evidently Harry spent his summer vacation. He sent also the photograph here given.

"OLD IRONSIDES."

The Constitution was built where the Constitution Wharf in Boston now stands in 1797. The first commander was Captain Nicholson, and her second commander was Captain Preble, who took her to the Mediterranean Sea in 1803 and fought bravely during the Tripolitan War. She was next engaged in the War of 1812 with England. While under the command of Captain Hull she sailed out of the harbor of Annapolis on a cruise, and came unexpectedly upon several British war vessels; as she could not fight them all, she got away by good seamanship

Her most important engagement was with the Guerriere, and after a hard time she left it a wreck. After this she cruised in the Pacific Ocean, commanded by Captain Bainbridge; she met with the Java and soon got her to surrender after a hard fight. In 1814 she sailed from Boston and cruised near the Cape de Verd Islands. She captured two British frigates and sailed them into port, but British vessels recaptured one of the prizes.

In 1876 she was repaired in Philadelphia and exhibited at the Centennial there. In 1882 she was brought to Portsmouth to be used as a receiving ship. She wasn't used for that purpose long and was then taken to the Kittery Navy Yard, and is visited by a great many people. There has been some talk about sending her to Washington.

The Constitution is very high and has many decks. She carried forty-four guns. Most all her staterooms are at the back where the officers sleep, and the sailors sleep in the forecastle in bunks or hammocks. Four men are engaged in steering her sometimes. There is a kind of double rudder wheel. Most all her rigging has now been taken down. She has been carefully roofed over to protect her. All her guns have been taken off. Inside she has two mottoes. One is, "A Kearsarge Welcome," and the other is, "Don't give up the ship." When she was in service she was painted black, but now she is painted a kind of a salmon color.

O. W. Holmes wrote a poem on the Constitution and called it "Old Ironsides." She ought to be kept in good order for doing so much for her country.

New Castle, N. H. HARRY T.

In addition to the facts which Harry has carefully collected, you ought to read the full story of the achievements of this noted ship. The clumsy looking old hulk, patched up and roofed over, lying idly at the wharf, will then become a magnificent frigate, under full spread of canvas, manned by four or five hundred New England sailors, making her remarkable escape from a whole British squadron, or conquering the great British war ships Guerriere and Java. With such brave defenders on the sea, the young nation felt safe from foreign invasion, and the people almost idolized "Old Ironsides," giving her most enthusiastic receptions whenever she appeared in our home ports.

While in Charlestown Navy Yard in 1830 orders were issued from the Navy Department to have her destroyed as unseaworthy and useless. A young man in Cambridge, barely twenty-one years old, saw the announcement, and was so aroused by it that he wrote with a lead pencil on a scrap of paper his protest in verse and sent it to the Boston Advertiser.

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down,
Long has it waved on high,
And many an eye has danced to see
That banner in the sky!

Holmes's verses saved the Constitution—as for many years afterwards they fired the patriotism of the schoolboys who spoke or heard them spoken from the platform of the academy or district school. The ship was rebuilt at Charlestown in 1834. This was in the administration of General Jackson, as you will see by our recent list of presidents in the Corner Scrap-book, and an incident occurred which occasioned a great sensation at the time. "To the victors belong the spoils" was the Jacksonian motto, so it was natural that a bust of Jackson should be carved and put in place as the figurehead of the old ship. Political feeling ran very high then in Boston—as sometimes nowadays. The people were indignant, and on the night before July 4, which was very dark and rainy, a Boston shipmaster dropped down the tide in a rowboat, secured it under the bows of the ship, sawed off the head of "Old Hickory," put it in a sack and silently floated away, though a sentry was all the while pacing the deck over his head. The ship was taken to New York and another image of General Jackson put in its place—I wish Harry had said whether it is the figurehead still. Thirty years afterwards the adventurous captain was alive, and printed on his address card the device of a hand saw, with the legend, "I came, I saw, I conquered."

I have read in a history that a beautiful coach was built of wood from the old Constitution at Amherst, Mass., in 1836—whatever became of that? I have a letter from Willie T., a Boston Corner boy, saying that his great-great-grandfather was a master blacksmith in the Charlestown Navy Yard, and gloried in the fact that he drove the first bolt in her staunch timbers.

But "peace hath her victories" far greater than those of war. When we think it over, which is more glorious, the awful battle at sea, in which half a thousand of men on one ship are struggling with terrible rage and cruelty to maim or murder the men upon another ship—men of one race and speech—or, as in our time, to have a plan of arbitration, so that Englishmen and Americans may never fight each other again? No triumphs of war can compare with the victories celebrated in Tremont Temple a few days ago, victories of missionaries and martyrs in the cause of blessing the poor of every race—black men, red men, Chinamen, "poor whites." Two little incidents in the "patriotic meetings" at Faneuil Hall that week had more meaning for humanity than a dozen battles: one was when the Jubilee Negro Singers were so much moved in singing "Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord" that they could not restrain their tears, the other when the great audience said Aye to Edward Everett Hale's resolution in favor of the free admission of Armenian exiles to our country. Before you will have read this you have doubtless seen another victory of peace—the settlement of great national questions by ballots rather than by bullets!

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Queen Victoria's Long Reign. Of course you noticed in the papers not long ago that the English people, on a given day, were pouring in their congratulations upon their Queen because her reign had then reached in duration that of any previous sovereign. Did you look it up in your histories, so as to understand it fully? Her grandfather, George III., took the throne, Oct. 10, 1760. He died Jan. 29, 1820, his full reign having covered fifty-nine years, three months and four days. Victoria began to reign June 20, 1837, so that on Sept. 23, 1896, her reign was equally long with his. In reality, it far exceeded that of George III., who was insane the last nine years of his life, and king only in name. Should she live until next June, her sixtieth anniversary will doubtless be celebrated with great pomp, and we in America shall join heartily with her own subjects in shouting, Long live the Queen!

Remarks. What do you think of the royal system as compared with our form of government? Are there not advantages in such a long reign as that of Victoria? Does not the long preparation of the prince who is to succeed to the throne specially fit him for his office? On the other hand, the people have no part in the choice of the ruler, who sometimes may chance to be entirely unfit for the place, not only in character and ability, but in age. Some thought that Mr. Bryan was almost too young to be a candidate [that is no objection, Mr. M., he'll be a good deal older before he is elected.—D. F.]; what would they say of a ruler two months old, like Henry VI., or ten years old, like Edward VI., or even like good Queen Victoria, who was only eighteen years old when crowned? [If you ask me, I would say that I see no objection to a young lady eighteen years old; if otherwise qualified to rule over men.—D. F.] This whole subject is worth thinking over carefully.

The Sunday School

LESSON FOR NOV. 22. Prov. 3: 1-17.

REWARDS OF OBEDIENCE.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

Last Sunday our theme was God's blessing on Solomon. These verses from the book of Proverbs mention and explain blessings which God gives and the ways in which they are gained. We are here shown:

I. The relations between righteousness and happiness [vs. 1-10]. On the one side are placed the rules of life which secure the highest blessing. They are these:

1. Keep God's commandments [v. 1]. Read his word. Know it by heart. Commit it to memory and understand it by practice. This is old and oft-repeated counsel. See Deut. 6: 6-9; Josh. 1: 8, and with your reference Bible find other counsels of the same kind. This is the comprehensive command, of which those that follow are parts.

2. Cling to mercy and truth [v. 3]. The first is the law of kindness, the second is the law of sincerity. See the best in others and honor them for it. Sympathize with them in their trials. Show them the best in you. Be kind, and make your kindness always honest. Let this be your habit.

3. Trust in God [vs. 5, 6]. Hold to the conviction that he is infinitely good and that he loves you. Don't let any of your own reasoning shake your confidence in him. Let your trust be whole-souled. Recognize his hand in all the events of your life.

4. Be obedient [v. 7]. Never let your opinion of yourself lead you to self-conceit. Stand in awe before God and withdraw from every evil suggestion.

5. Give generously [v. 9]. Give simply to please God. Give to promote the welfare of your fellowmen. Give systematically. Whenever you receive anything as the fruit of your labor, set apart some definite portion of it thus to be given away.

Keeping these rules will promote:

1. Long life [v. 2]. These laws are good for the body. They are "health to thy navel and marrow to thy bones."

2. Peace of mind. Keeping God's commands insures an untroubled conscience, an even temper, fearlessness before the unknown future. A faithful minister in severe sickness was asked if he feared to die. "I care not," he said; "for if I depart I shall be with God, and if I stay he will be with me."

3. Favor with God and man [v. 4]. That is not withheld from upright men who obey divine laws and are unselfishly interested in the welfare of others. They are the trusted men in the community.

4. Assurance of divine direction [v. 6]. Those who habitually pray with a good conscience do not doubt that God hears and guides them. Their interests, even in the smallest affairs, are his also, and they delight to seek his guidance in all things.

5. A good income [v. 10]. Wise spending of money surely tends to increase it. There are abundant testimonies of prosperous men that the use of a fixed part of their income for benevolent purposes has not only added to their enjoyment, but has increased their means. We do not know of one who has suffered through so doing.

With all this we may not affirm that a good man is always happy or free from burdens. But we are assured that God orders his life for good. Thus we are led to consider:

II. The use of suffering [vs. 11, 12]. Only by enduring hardness do we become good soldiers. To see the divine hand of love in the trials of life and to be drawn by them closer to our Father is to master them. Through discipline men discover the meaning of sonship, and sons of God find what blessing he bestows in chastening. Paul had a great trial. He prayed earnestly for its removal. It was not removed; but he was taught its effect in strengthening his character, subduing his pride and increasing his influence with men. Then that "messenger of Satan to buffet" him became a delight. "Wherefore I take pleasure in weaknesses, in injuries, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake; for when I am weak, then am I strong." Trials are God's school, and happy are they who attend it as a privilege and learn its noblest lessons.

III. The possession of wisdom [vs. 13-17]. We ought to learn:

1. What it is. It is knowing the will of God and doing it. That is the noble life. It means fidelity to duty, honesty of soul, a heart and mind fearlessly open to God, with filial trust in him. Can silver and gold be compared with character? The poorest man who can be trusted is worth far more to the world than the richest man who cannot be trusted. What are rubies, as compared with the life which reflects Christ to men?

2. What wisdom produces. It multiplies itself in noble lives. Can there be a finer tribute than that which Thomas Hughes pays to his teacher, Thomas Arnold, when he says that the distinguishing characteristic of Rugby boys was their hearty Christian spirit, which they owed to Arnold's teaching and example—above all, to his unwearied zeal in creating "moral thoughtfulness" in every boy with whom he came in contact? "He taught us that life is a whole, made up of actions and thoughts and longings, great and small, noble and ignoble. Therefore the only true wisdom for boy or man is to bring the whole life into obedience to him whose world we live in and who has purchased us with his blood." Such men, who know wisdom, produce upright communities and a strong nation.

3. How wisdom is enjoyed. The wise life is the happy life—an experience of pleasant ways and peaceful paths. There is no shame in memory, no fear from scrutinizing eyes, no shrinking from the future to those who walk in wisdom's ways. She is like the tree of life in the garden of Eden from which sin was ever enticing away the man and the woman, but to which, till they abandoned it, they might always return and satisfy their hunger. Happy is the man whose aims and doings are the same as God's. Jesus could express the perfectness of his life in no clearer language than this: "Whatsoever things the Father doeth, these the Son also doeth in like manner."

4. How wisdom is kept. Only by keeping the thoughts fixed on what is right do men live aright. Evil passions are kept out of the soul only by holy passions. To the empty and swept house from which evil spirits have been banished worse spirits return. "Give me a great thought," said Goethe, "that I may live on it." Read good books, live in the company of pure souls, give yourselves to lift up other lives, and wisdom will not forsake you. Above all, keep before your eyes the vision of Christ as he lived among men from his first human birth to his crucifixion. Love him and grow like him. That gives beauty—life to the soul and grace to the neck. That gives steadiness and security, whatever storms surround us. "Some of you shall they cause to be put to death, and ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake, and not a hair of your head shall perish." That gives the true rest. "Thou shalt lie down and thy sleep shall be sweet." "My peace I give unto you."

The book of Proverbs nowhere directly holds out hope of a future life as a reward for righteousness. Everywhere the right life is described as its own reward. But Christ has brought to us "life and incorruption through the gospel." We know that the wrong life chosen sinks the soul into unending despair, which cannot escape from its own degradation as an outcast from God. We know that the right life is forever in fellowship with him, enjoying his blessedness.

If the day of Christ is to be marked by the growth of Christian knowledge, it must be a day of prayer.—W. Robertson Nicoll.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

OUR OWN WORK.

Mexican Christians in Conference. It seems strange to read of a conference of Congregational churches and congregations in bigoted, priest-ridden Mexico, yet the representative Christians of southern Chihuahua held their second meeting this fall in Las Cuevas. Mr. Olds reports that, although fifteen miles away from Parral, the attendance was good and the interest intense. The delegates, representing nine congregations, came in carts and on burros, horseback and afoot, two men traveling 200 miles over the mountains to be present. The most noteworthy feature of the convention was the prominent part taken by the young men from the El Paso Training School, seven of whom were present, three of them being in charge of churches in the district. From the one who was moderator of the convention to the youngest student all seven did credit to their school. They were at home with the language and understood their own people, which qualifications, together with their intellectual and spiritual training, made it possible for them to convince and inspire as Americans could not have done. At an evening meeting in the commodious Las Cuevas chapel 175 persons gathered, some of them to listen to the gospel message for the first time. Mr. Olds writes: "Such a congregation had never before been seen in Las Cuevas, and indeed superstition and fanaticism would have made such a thing impossible a few years ago. But now, instead of interruption and insult, there was respectful and earnest attention."

Congregationalism in Texas. Not long ago we called attention to the remarkable home missionary work which a brave, enterprising New England woman—a lineal descendant of Peregrine White—is doing in the piny woods of East Texas. She started a Sunday school first, then a praise service which was merged into a preaching service at which she herself officiated, reading the sermons of eminent preachers, and finally a C. E. Society. The Home Missionary for November contains a bright, interesting letter from this loyal Congregationalist, who says she is very lonesome and often wonders why she was selected to be a denominational object lesson for East Texas. There is no Congregational church nearer than eighteen miles, and only seventeen in the State, some of them without pastors. With regard to the outlook for the organization of a church in her own community of Pine Valley, she writes with anxiety: "Six months ago the way to a church and definite work seemed open. Now, because of the hard times, we expect to have to shut down our mill. We cannot sell the five and a half millions of lumber on hand. Shutting down means keeping perhaps twenty men, and scattering the 150 others that we seem to have had a hold upon. So far as Sunday services go we are doing fairly well, but we need a resident pastor and his wife. People in this country are 'preached at' too much. No pastoral work is being done. What Congregationalists need in Texas is recognition. Now Texas is moving forward rapidly and some day the older States will be proud of her acquaintance."

THE WORLD AROUND.

Mediæval Darkness in the Philippine Islands. Roman Catholic monks of the Dominican Order are said to be largely responsible for the rebellion in the Philippine Islands. Certainly the exactions of the Spanish priests, added to the oppressive system of government, have proved unbearable to the Malays, the Mestizos, or half-breeds, and the natives. In the matter of intolerable taxation the poor islanders might sympathize with the Armenians, for the Spanish Government, backed by the Roman Catholic Church, has made extortionate demands upon farmers and merchants. Everything on the farm of the small native cultivator has been taxed; every bit of produce that came to Manila has been made to furnish its tribute to the civil government and again to the priests. There are no Protestant missions on the islands, and Dominican friars have full sway, not only in religious matters, but in political affairs as well. In the country districts the curé is the fountain head of all government. He overrides the civil magistrate whenever he sees fit, wielding his power, not for the welfare of the people, but in order to add to the wealth and political importance of his order. In short, the friars in the Philippine Islands are repeating the offenses for which they were secularized in Spain. The shocking tales of the savagery which characterize the rebellion does not speak well for the type of civilization and Christianity which Spain has introduced.

The New China. Those who heard or read the speech of Mr. E. B. Drew at the recent dinner of the Commercial Club in Boston could not but be impressed by his hopeful outlook in regard to China's development and progress. Mr. Drew, who is commissioner of customs in China and was in charge of the arrangements for the recent visit of Li Hung Chang to the United States, has lived for thirty years in the Celestial Empire and knows whereof he speaks. Naturally China's progress in the commercial world was the chief topic of his address. In the growing importance of the "modern European city" of Shanghai, which is already one of the chief commercial centers of the world; in the awakening and elevating influence of the numerous bodies of resident foreigners; in the progressive spirit of the Chinese merchants; in the multiplication of railroads, the working of coal and iron mines and the prospect during next year of sixteen cotton spinning and weaving mills, Mr. Drew sees hopeful indications of China's future. It is interesting to note his estimate of the missionary opportunity in connection with his remarks on the influence of foreigners: "While foreign merchants may reside at some thirty indicated points in China for purposes of business, the European and American missionaries, Protestant and Roman Catholic, enjoy still wider facilities for influencing the Chinese people. They are permitted by treaty to reside at any point throughout the entire empire, and to open schools, churches, hospitals, dispensaries, etc. It needs but little reflection to perceive what must be the effect of the missionary influence, as years go on, upon the people of China."

PEN AND SCISSORS.

The receipts for the C. H. M. S. for the first six months of its financial year are smaller by $75,000 than for the corresponding period in 1895.

On the first anniversary of the massacre of eleven missionaries at Ku-cheng, China, a beautiful white marble monument was unveiled. This was erected by means of contributions from the 1,800 foreigners residing in China.

An illustration of the rapidity with which the interior of Africa is opening to the world is the recent transmission of a telegram from Blantyre in the Shiré district, Central Africa, to a missionary secretary in Edinburgh in about three hours.

The Canadian Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board officials have just heard from Formosa that much damage has been done to their mission property there by the Japanese soldiers, who occupy the churches, insult the missionaries and disturb the congregations needlessly; and from Japan come reports that the outlook for the Board's mission work there is not as bright as it was before the war.

Boston, Revere, Fall River, Lynn, Worcester and other New England towns have received parties of Armenian refugees and are providing for them through the agency of the W. C. T. U. The Salvation Army, representatives of which were on hand in Marseilles and in New York, has also proved a friend in need. It will be remembered that one of the most popular figures in the army, known as "Joe, the Turk," is an Armenian. He acts as interpreter in the present emergency.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Nov. 22-28. Some Blessings often Forgotten. Ps. 104: 1-35.

We are never too prone to realize and acknowledge our blessings. We take them as a matter of course, not as the expression of human and divine love and care. A child grows up with all the advantages of a good home, excellent educational privileges and congenial society, but how infrequently he stops, either in childhood or youth or early manhood, to consider seriously the parental thought, foresight, patience and self-denial which have secured for him these advantages. He somehow comes to think that they belong to him by right, just as to many irresponsible men of maturer years with whom the conclusion of the whole matter seems to be "the world owes me a living."

If human gratitude is often lacking, still more infrequent are the tributes of praise to God for his manifold kindnesses. We grow up as children in his world, with his sky above our heads, with the solid earth stretching out before us and stored and adorned with beautiful and useful things. We are set in the midst of God's gracious providences which bear us along from one experience to another. We are brought in contact with numerous sources of refreshment and inspiration for life, and yet how little of genuine and constant thanksgiving ascends to the God and Father of us all, who gives us richly all things to enjoy, who hath made everything beautiful in its season and who is over all blessed forever.

It sometimes happens that God uses apparently harsh methods to bring us up to a sharp realization of what we have had from his liberal hand. He prostrates us on sickbeds, and then we realize what a boon is health. He takes away a friendship, and then we see how barren is life without it. He substitutes for an environment of ease and comfort one of humdrum and struggle, and then we understand how exceptional and favored is that life which moves constantly along a path strewn with roses. At such seasons as these God's forgotten blessings come into view. Well for us if we can see them before they become not merely lost sight of but altogether passed.

Even if we try to cherish, day by day, a sense of God's goodness, and to keep before us the great and most evident mercies along our way, it is probable that diligent search would reveal still other reasons for gratitude. Nearly every one has in his own temperament something for which he ought to give special thanks. It may be capacity to enjoy the most exquisite music or the noblest triumphs of the brush and chisel. It may be an inherited streak of humor which permits him to see the comical side of daily life and to find in it some surcease from care. It may be an accumulated fund of good nature whereby our own burdens are lightened and it becomes easier for other people to live with us. Turn the X rays upon your personal characteristics and upon your daily surroundings, and let what they reveal stir your heart to thankfulness. And remember always that a sense of the nearness and love of God is the only inexhaustible fountain of gratitude.

Topic, Nov. 15-21. Job's Trials and Ours. Job 23: 1-12; Jas. 5: 7-16.

Have we greater knowledge of God than Job? How can we exercise patience in trial? What is our duty toward others in trouble?

Literature

SIR GEORGE TRESSADY.

This is more an actual story and less a treatise in the form of a novel than either of Mrs. Humphry Ward's earlier important productions. It has neither a theological motive, like that of Robert Elsmere, nor a sociological, like that of Marcella. Her ideas as to the best methods of bridging the gap between the rich and the poor are made prominent and constitute a distinct feature of the work, but they do not dominate it. Nor is it a love story of the ordinary type, although love determines its form and supplies much of its interest. But it is one-sided love, love unreturned and hopeless and therefore productive of many perplexing situations.

Marcella reappears as Lady Maxwell, and really is the leading character. The strength of the book lies in its generally consistent and always charming portrayal of her unique and difficult personality. Sir George Tressady himself is a somewhat minor creation. The narrative describes his unhappy marriage, the growth of his attachment to Marcella, her devoted loyalty to her husband and their united, generous and hearty efforts to preserve a mutually honorable and helpful friendship with Sir George, and to improve his faulty wife into a fit companion for him, and his own tragic death.

The author's delineations of personality are remarkably vivid and impressive and several of the subordinate characters are almost as distinctly remembered as the chief actors. The work illustrates authorship of the most conscientious sort. Some features of the plot strike one as unnatural and ill-judged, e. g., the appeal of Marcella and her husband to Tressady to go to France after Ancoats, but down to its minutest detail the story has been planned and written with a care not often exhibited in such literature. If one does not always feel that the author was inspired to write, one never is doubtful of her masterly ability or her high ideal.

A striking feature of the work is its succession of political pictures. A parliamentary election and the contest within Parliament itself over a stoutly fought bill, for instance, are described with a minuteness and a realism which evidently are the fruits of studies from life, and readers familiar with recent English political history probably will think that they can guess closely at some of the originals of these portraits. Labor disputes also come in for equally photographic treatment. Mrs. Ward is very successful in mastering and handling such subjects as these. And they afford a background against which certain strongly contrasted types of character stand out strikingly.

The novel probably will be discussed in an unusual degree. People will differ as to the naturalness, the wisdom or the consequences of this or that feeling or action in its pages. But all will agree that it must more than maintain Mrs. Ward's honorable and fairly-won repute as a writer. [Macmillan Co. $2.00.]

RELIGIOUS.

Here is another volume from that prolific writer, Rev. J. R. Miller, D. D. Things to Live For [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.00] is its title, and its twenty four chapters are full of wise and diversified spiritual council. Without ever rising to great hights, the author succeeds in inspiring the reader, and his practical and eminently sensible piety qualifies the book to do important service. Many different departments of Christian experience are discussed, and the reader will find something for almost every mood. It is a thoroughly excellent little volume.——The rhetorical quality of Better Things for Sons of God [Eaton & Mains. 75 cents], by G. T. Lemmon, will prejudice some readers against it, but will attract others. It is almost fanciful at times, yet it leaves an impression of positiveness and helpfulness. Some people will find it uncommonly stimulating and all Christian readers will glean from it a great deal of interest and value.

Rev. G. J. Jones's volume of Sabbath evening addresses, entitled The American Church [Dean, Warters & Gaut. 50 cents], contains examples of the ordinary pulpit work of the author, which reveal him as an earnest, practical and effective preacher, but which contain no special striking feature. Such sermons do admirable service, even though they are not examples of the highest order of preaching.——The Development of Doctrine in the Epistles [American Baptist Publication Society. 50 cents], by Prof. C. R. Henderson, D. D., is the eighth of the series of Bible Handbooks for Young People. It is apparently intended for use as a text-book for Bible class study. It is hardly more than an outline, but it is clear, logical and suited to all classes of scholars. Of course the subject of baptism is treated from the point of view of the author's denomination, but in general the book is adapted to be used by all evangelical Christians.——Good Cheer for a Year [E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.25] contains selections from the writings of the late Bishop Phillips Brooks, made by W. M. L. Jay. Accompanying these are selections of verse and appropriate texts of Scripture. The plan of the book is familiar and it ranks among the better specimens of its class.

The Goodenough & Woglom Co. of New York have issued a select list of Appropriate Books for Sunday School Use, containing, it is said, reviews of over 800 volumes, which have been examined and accepted by the literary committee of the Sunday School Library Bulletin. All who are interested in selecting books for the Sunday school library may find some help in examining this list.——The Modern Readers' Bible [Macmillan Co. 50 cents], edited by Prof. R. G. Moulton of Oxford University, now contains nine volumes, the latest of which is The Judges. The series is printed in an exceedingly neat and compact volume, the text of the Revised Version with some marginal alternatives has been followed and a few notes have been added. ——The seventh bound volume of the Expository Times [Charles Scribner's Sons. Imported. $2.50] is out in the usual admirable form. The quality of the publication is too well known to need comment. In its present shape it makes a handsome and useful book.——A life of Christ for little folks entitled Gentle Jesus [Thomas Whittaker. $1.25] has been prepared by Helen E. Jackson. It is for the younger children and its simple nature and entertaining style adapt it admirably to accomplish its purpose. It is illustrated freely and well. It will become a household favorite in many families and will be helpful in making Sunday afternoon enjoyable.

STORIES.

Martin J. Pritchard is the nom de plume of a lady who has written an uncommonly able novel, Without Sin [Herbert S. Stone & Co.]. Indeed, it is one of the most striking among recent stories. It also is one of the saddest. Yet it abounds in beautiful passages and it is a touching and uplifting book, although we greatly wish that certain pages had been differently written. We dare not commend it to young readers, yet the objections to so doing lie in the inherent difficulty of the theme and not at all in any reckless spirit on the author's part. It is a narrative of life among the Jews in London and its motive is the delusion and terrible disappointment of a noble and lovely young Jewess, who imagines herself to be the mother of the Messiah. The delineation of this remarkable character is wonderfully consistent and noble and the background which the minor characters form is portrayed with equal distinctness and probably more fidelity to life. Whether the climax in the last chapter does not weaken the story is a question which we should answer decidedly in the affirmative. The book, however, makes a profound impression upon the reader.

In The Other House [Macmillan Co. $1.50] Mr. Henry James has illustrated afresh, but disagreeably, his remarkable power as a psychological expert. There is little or nothing else noteworthy about the book. It is a play of few actors and little incident until the distressing climax, and only those who care less to learn what people do than how and why they do it, to have all the machinery of motive and suggestion exposed to view, will delight in it. Next to nothing is left to the reader's imagination, but the author parades from page to page with merciless frankness and iteration his smartness in dissecting and putting together his characters. The climax of the book is as unnatural as it is repulsive, and the apparently hopeless mess—no other word seems appropriate—in which everybody is left reveals Mr. James's lack of the sense of artistic fitness.

The New York Herald offered prizes last year for the best novelette, and the first prize, $3 000, was awarded to The Sprightly Romance of Marsac [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25], by Molly Elliott Seawell, which has now been reprinted in a volume. It is amusing and of a high literary order. The actors are chiefly Parisian French people, and the author seems to have caught the jaunty, vivacious spirit of the French successfully. The plot cannot be considered as too probable, but the reader does not find himself in a critical mood and the grace and spirit of the story and the consistency with which the different characters are represented combine to leave delightful impressions. It is the lightest of light literature, yet it has substantial merit. The book is illustrated fittingly by Gustave Verbeek, and French Bohemia seldom, if ever, has been described more effectively.

The Mistress of Brae Farm [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1 25], by Rosa Nouchette Carey, is a serious story somewhat too fully elaborated, yet undeniably growing in interest to the end. It is a picture of English village life, and the author causes everybody to fall in love with the wrong person and then is forced to some severe measures in order to straighten things out. But her task is accomplished with reasonable success and many of the pictures on her pages are very vivid, and the book is pervaded with the noblest and most helpful spirit.

We regret not to be able to say the same thing of Paul Bourget's A Tragic Idyl [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50]. It has been imperfectly translated, and apparently the author, as well as the translator, has sometimes been careless, but the more serious objection to the book is its unblushing sensualism. If it do not openly justify unlawful love it certainly does so by implication, and the highminded reader will grow very weary of the ebbs and flows of riotous and deceptive affection here described. When such a story is unwholesome in itself and not even attractive in style it stands in great need of justification.

A Lonely Maid [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1 00] is an ordinary sort of a novel, very much in the familiar vein of the author, Mrs. Hungerford, familiarly known as "The Duchess." It is an Irish story, unlikely, inconsistent and fanciful, yet lively and at times amusing. The heroine is attractive, but none of the other characters interest one specially.

Several of Mr. Thomas Nelson Page's well known stories, including Marse Chan and Meh Lady, have been reprinted in a fascinating volume, In Ole Virginia [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50], which Messrs. Smedley, Reinhart, Frost and others have illustrated with delicate and effective skill. The publishers have done their part of the work with their usual fidelity, and the volume will rank high in the list of holiday books.——From the same publishers comes Love in Old Cloathes and Other Stories [$1 50], by the late H. C. Bunner, in which seven of this popular writer's short stories, all carefully selected, vivid and delightful, are grouped together and are accompanied by a number of excellent pictures. Mr. Bunner's numerous public will welcome this book.

JUVENILE.

Miss Charlotte M. Yonge has added one more book to the tremendous list of her productions. The Wardship of Steep Coombe is its title [Thomas Whittaker. $1.25], and it is a sketch of English life in the time of the youth of King Richard the Second. It is superior to most of her recent works, is a vivid sketch of popular life, especially among young people, of that day, and deals to some extent with public affairs, such as the famous rebellion headed by Wat Tyler. The boys and girls will enjoy it, and will gain from it some historical impressions of value.——A Son of Liberty [Cong. S. S. & Pub. Soc. $1.25] is Mr. Willis B. Allen's latest volume. This, too, is historical, and the author's familiar narrative power has enabled him once more to give his readers a book at once useful and entertaining. The period is that just preceding the Revolution in New England, and the story is told naturally and with spirit. The growing interest in historical subjects among young people is something to be thankful for, and it is at once stimulated and satisfied by volumes of this class.

From the same publishers comes The Fairies of Fern Dingle [$1.00], by Mrs. Harriet A. Cheever. Many facts of natural history are used with a purpose of instruction, the book being meant for the younger children, and successful use is made of a background of fancy, the effect of the book being charming and its popularity a certainty. The appetite of children for real knowledge often is forgotten, but such a book as this ministers to it without failing to appeal also to what is equally prominent in them, the imagination.——On the Staff [Lee & Shepard. $1 50] is the fourth in Oliver Optic's series, The Blue and the Gray —on Land. It is a war story of the time of the Rebellion, and is written with the author's usual comprehension of the interest of boys in spirited adventure —— The Maine coast, a gruff but warm-hearted old captain, a lovable little girl and a succession of striking occurrences, culminating in a shipwreck, are the material of A Short Cruise [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 50 cents], by James Otis. Mr. Otis is one of the best known contributors to the juvenile magazines, and nothing from his pen needs an elaborate introduction to American children.

P. S. Newell's odd volume, A Shadow Show [Century Co. $1.00], is one of those amusing books which have not become so common as to lose their interest, in which the shadow is a vital feature. Upon one side of each page is a picture, and if the reverse side of the page is examined, the light being allowed to shine through, an entirely different and equally lifelike picture is seen and the versatility and skill of the designer could hardly have been illustrated more effectively. —— Another fascinating picture book, which is more than a mere picture book because it describes a possible amusement, is Gobolinks, or Shadow Pictures for Young and Old [Century Co. $1.00]. It is almost incredible that such a variety of designs should have been made in the manner described, but the authors and artists, Ruth McEnery Stuart and Albert B. Paine, give us their word that every picture in this book was made solely in the manner described, i. e., by dropping a little ink on a sheet of white paper then folding over the sheet and pressing the ink spots together. It is astonishing what picturesque, lifelike and amusing results can be obtained, and examples of them fill this book, which will be very popular with the children.

The Wonderful Fairies of the Sun [Roberts Bros. $1 25] contains poetry by E. V. Wright and illustrations by Cora M. Norman. It is a comical little book, something in the vein of Palmer Cox's Brownies, and it will make many a young eye brighten about Christmastime.——Paper Doll Poems [75 cents], by Pauline King, also comes from the Century Co., and its droll rhymes and equally droll outline pictures qualify it manifestly for a nursery favorite.

MISCELLANEOUS.

It would be an ungracious task to subject to ordinary criticism such a volume as Reminiscences of an Octogenarian of the City of New York [Harper & Bros. $3.00], by C. H. Haswell, for the author has made no attempt to offer a connected narrative of the ordinary sort, but has simply edited chronologically a large mass of collected material relating to the history of New York city between the years of 1816 and 1860, and also has drawn largely from his own reminiscences. The result is a volume exceedingly miscellaneous in character and uneven in respect to importance, and it is put together without the slightest attempt at classification. Sometimes several items entirely unlike in their nature are grouped in one paragraph of a few lines. It is therefore valuable chiefly as a book of reference, but viewed in this light it must always be important to the student of New York city history. It is illustrated amply and touches upon so many themes and contains so much information that it possesses permanent and considerable value. But the author needs to be reminded that The Congregationalist is an older religious paper than the New York Observer, and still more that his utterance on page 425 about the late John B. Gough is, in its present form, a cruel, although of course an unintentional, misrepresentation of the truth about that beloved and distinguished reformer.

Lieut. A. M. Rohan and Prof. M. M. Ramsey have joined forces in preparing The Island of Cuba [Henry Holt & Co. $1 25], a descriptive and historical account of the island which is especially pertinent just at present. Should Spain fail to retain her hold over Cuba, the question will rise immediately whether or not the United States should attempt to secure the island. While we are convinced that such acquisition would be exceedingly dangerous there is something to be said in favor of it, and such a book as this, which is a detailed study of the natural features of the island, its population, its resources and its history, will be of great value in aiding intelligent Americans to decide what is wise.

Lovers of nature and of Mr. John Burroughs's vivid and sympathetic descriptions of nature, and they are many, will welcome A Year in the Fields [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], a book of selections from Mr. Burroughs's writings illustrated by Mr. Clifton Johnson with something like a score of photographs, in many of which Mr. Burroughs personally appears. No other modern writer takes his reader closer to the heart of nature than Mr. Burroughs or interprets for them more successfully the suggestions of the changes of the seasons, the migration of birds, the habits of animals, etc. It is a pleasure to read these sketches afresh and Mr. Johnson's pictures add much to one's pleasure as one reads.

Mrs. Julia C. R. Dorr's charming little book, A Cathedral Pilgrimage [Macmillan Co. 50 cents], is rich in delight to those who have made such a pilgrimage, and a multitude of others who desire to make one will read the book with almost equal enthusiasm, and indeed the great reading public will appreciate its attractiveness. Winchester, Salisbury, Peterborough, Ripon, Durham, Canterbury, Litchfield, Exeter, Fountains and Furness—what memories the names revive! And Mrs. Dorr not only refreshes the memory and creates living pictures, if the memory be without resource, but she also writes in a style so simple, so sympathetic and so scholarly, yet without a trace of pedantry, that her little book is a delight. More and more Americans frequent the English cathedrals and more and more doubtless grow to believe that, when all has been said in praise of the continental shrines, the English surpass all others. This little book by Mrs. Dorr is suited, in its pocket size, as well as its contents, to be a serviceable and highly appreciated traveling companion.

One takes up Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton's books with the assurance of being both entertained and profited. Whether she is as successful in prose sketches as in her verse may be open to doubt, yet the successive chapters of her Lazy Tour in Spain and Elsewhere [Roberts Bros. $1.50], if they do not rise as far above similar sketches by other authors as her sonnets, for example, surpass those of many other poets, they nevertheless are bright pictures of travel and sight-seeing, graphic in what they describe, vivid in the impressions which they suggest, with many a touch of deep feeling and not without occasional humor. They might have been improved by the omission of certain trifling details, but they are very enjoyable throughout.

Prof. Hiram Corson, LL. D., has edited a volume of selections from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales [Macmillan Co. 90 cents], following the Ellesmere text and supplying a comprehensive and valuable glossary as well as a scholarly introduction and ample notes. The book is adapted to use in school or college and will furnish a pleasant introduction to this famous writer and the literature of his time.——Legends of the Middle Ages [American Book Co. $1.50], by H. A. Guerber, includes the stories of Beowulf, Reynard the Fox, The Niebelungen Lied, Charlemagne and His Paladins, Merlin, The Round Table, The Cid, and many more, and is intended for young students who do not require a manual of literature, but desire to make acquaintance with the best of the romances of the mediæval world. The final chapter furnishes a general and concise survey of Romance literature.——Rosine Melle has edited and annotated Morceaux Choisis [Ginn & Co.], by Jules Lemâitre. It includes essays by Lemâitre on Renan, Zola, Daudet, Maupassant, Bourget and other modern French authors, and also on Ibsen and Maeterlinck, and there is some other material. Notes, with a descriptive and critical introduction, complete the work, which is well done.

The Century Company has issued a dainty little book of the short sayings of E. S. O'Connor. It is called Tracings [$1.00], and it illustrates the pithy manner in which a keen intellect which has made some study of terseness learns to express itself. Agnes Repplier, an expert in the same line herself, has furnished the introduction.——Platform Pearls [Funk & Wagnalls Co. 75 cents], by Lillian M. Heath, contains a fairly good collection of selections for entertainments and public meetings. We should have omitted many of them if we had compiled it, but probably most of those who will use it will prefer the volume as it is to the one which we should have made.——The Student's Diary [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25], compiled by C. W. Wendte, seems needlessly expensive, but is a serviceable note-book and contains many facts and other items of practical importance which one sometimes desires to know without long search.——Dr. J. G. Hodgins has edited The Ryerson Memorial Volume, describing the unveiling of the statue of Rev. Edgerton Ryerson, D. D., LL. D., founder of the school system of Ontario. Although the occurrences here described happened seven years ago, the eminence of the author in the world of education perhaps justifies us in calling attention to the volume.

The Golden Rule in Business [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 35 cents] is by Rev. C. F. Dole, and is a sturdy and effective plea for honesty, sympathy and brotherly kindness in business as well as life in general. Into its few pages is condensed a great amount of wholesome truth judiciously uttered. ——After College What?—for Girls [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 35 cents], by Mrs. Helen E. Starrett, also is a sensible, large-minded, suggestive and in every way admirable discussion, although in brief compass, of the important subject suggested by this question, and we heartily commend it.——Rev. G. W. Shinn has grouped four short chapters under the title Friendly Talks About Marriage [Joseph Knight & Co. $1.00], in which good sense and religion have suggested wholesome utterances such as young people should heed, and in a form which many of them will welcome. The subject often has been discussed, but there is room for another handling of it so appropriate as this.——Several new yearbooks have come to hand and deserve notice. One is Concerning Friendship [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1 00] compiled by Eliza A. Stone. A large list of authors has been consulted, and all of them have had something valuable to say on the subject, which the compiler has gleaned and grouped into a tempting volume.——About Children [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00] is by Rose Porter, and this, too, is a choice collection of pithy and pertinent sayings, many of which are instinct with deep feeling, and all of which for one or another reason deserve to be read and reread.

NOTES.

—— Rudyard Kipling now means to live in England for some time to come.

—— Mr. Blackmore offered Lorna Doone to nineteen publishers before he could get it brought out.

—— Mrs. Oliphant has written seventy-eight novels. She always composes at night for the sake of greater quiet.

—— Four of the leading New York publishers are issuing more than seventy-five books apiece this fall.

—— It is a good sign that The Yellow Book and similar publications have failed to find much support among American readers. They illustrate a morbid and demoralizing type of literature which deserves to fail.

—— The first known collector of book-plates was a Miss Jenkins, of Bath, Eng. Since 1820 her collection has grown, says Book News, into the 100,000 specimens owned by Dr. Howard. Lord de Tabley was the earliest historian of the art. The first American artist to date an engraved plate was Nathaniel Hurd of Boston. Paul Revere's plates are the most rare, only four signed ones being now known.

—— Messrs. Harper & Bros. have fallen into line by becoming a stock company, having hitherto been a partnership. No change of policy is intended nor will any new members be admitted to the corporation. The capitalization is in the sum of $2,000,000 and the corporators are John W. Harper, a son of the original John Harper—who with his brother James founded the old firm in 1817—and J. Henry Harper, John Harper, James Thorne Harper, Horatio R. Harper, Henry S. Harper and James Harper, all grandsons of the original founders of the house.

—— When the church tower was being taken down recently at Boskoop, in South Holland, five little religious books were found walled in. Professor Acquoy of Leyden says they are such as were used at the "hedge-preachings" during the Spanish invasion, and they must be at least 300 years old. One of them, "Some Psalms and Other Hymns in use in the Christian Community in these Netherlands," has become so lost to public recollection that its very title has disappeared from all known records. It includes seven Psalms and as many hymns from a collection of twenty-five used by Dutch refugees in London.

President Patton of Princeton University, in his sermon preceding the celebration of the sesqui-centennial, dwelt upon the problem of "religion in the university." He is convinced that its solution "requires more wisdom, tact and knowledge of the actual condition of thought in the learned world" than is needed for any other problem of university administration. He also is convinced that it cannot be adequately dealt with by any one who is not actually in contact with under-graduate life. That apparently excludes the trustees. He is convinced that it cannot be dealt with adequately by any save those whose professional studies bring them into close relations with the religious problems of the day. That apparently excludes many of the teachers in all institutions. Who, then, shall decide? But President Patton, while he does not answer this question, does not fail to make it known that he believes that religion has a place in the university life and the Bible study a place in its curriculum. What that place is can best be described in his own words:

I believe that in the early years of undergraduate life a course of elementary Biblical instruction adapted to the needs of young men, who are no longer schoolboys on the one hand and are not yet students of philosophy on the other, is a most important part of the curriculum; but I would not carry Biblical instruction into the upper years of the curriculum unless in point of scientific thoroughness it could compare favorably with the work done in other departments. . . . For if secular themes are to be discussed in a Christian university in a religious spirit and under Christian conceptions, it is no less true that religious themes must be discussed in a scientific spirit and according to scientific principles.

Such is the breadth and the conservatism of the new Princeton. What better ideal could be set up?

While there has been extraordinary unanimity among the leaders of organized labor in favor of Mr. Bryan, the election returns clearly show that the votes of the great mass of unorganized wage-earners have been largely influenced by the same considerations which appealed to business men.—Mayor Quincy of Boston.

Exactly. Employers and employés have everything in common. That which benefits the one benefits the other. A few more such incidents of blind leadership as Mr. Quincy mentions, and "organized labor" will dwindle faster even than it has during the last decade. The vote in manufacturing towns throughout New England, New York and the Interior indicates that the wage-earner, "uncoerced," saw the light and walked in it.

The National Election as Others Saw It.

The editors of The Congregationalist believe that the principles adopted by our nation as the basis of government have profound influence over the moral and religious character of its citizens. They believe that when such principles are presented for adoption it is the duty of religious teachers to understand them and to set forth their meaning and the consequences which are likely to follow their acceptance or rejection. Therefore from the time the platforms of the parties in the campaign just closed were announced The Congregationalist has discussed the issues presented, and has used its influence toward securing the adoption of those principles which we believe essential to the integrity and prosperity of the nation.

In this effort we have been assured through numerous letters of the hearty approval of the large majority of our readers. We have also received some criticisms from those who disagree with us. Some of these letters show conditions of mind which help us better to understand and to sympathize with those who are disappointed in the results of this election. They may help our readers also in the same way. We therefore print extracts below from some of these letters.

MINISTERIAL OPINION.

Several ministers have written us that to them no moral significance appears in the issues of the campaign. Says one in New York State:

If McKinley is a Methodist, Bryan is a Presbyterian. The issue is not moral but purely political, a question of finance upon which even the highest political economists differ. It has, so far as I can see, no place whatever in the Christian pulpit. It does not effect either religion or ethics. . . .

I recognize your sincerity, I respect your ability, but I do believe the advice you offer to ministers is neither in the interests of the church nor humanity. While seemingly broad, it is really narrow. The Unitarian pulpit is an illustration of the effects of such preaching. In the end it never wins. All Unitarian ministers are exponents of the questions of the hour, but they have not built up their church. Why? People come for bread, and they get a stone. Your counsel would bring our pulpits down to the same level, and the Congregational church would soon be as the Unitarian, which resembles the empty grave of Jesus—Jesus himself has gone.

An Illinois minister thus relieves his overburdened mind:

Paying your debt now in a fifty-cent dollar makes the man of God scream with righteous indignation. "A moral issue," O ye gods, is this dishonest dollar? Compare the financial evil with the drink evil. Open up your guns against the silver craze and spike them as to the liquor craze. Load up a Krupp gun for grasshoppers and a popgun for buffaloes. You see "proletarians, communes and the specter of revolution." Better see snakes, some of which are wiggling around a certain Canton town. When I see the power of that Syrian god, mammon, exerting itself on the preachers and religious press, I have a little better understanding of "few there be which find it." I am going to vote for Levering. I am having hard work to hold myself to this resolution, and sometimes I am afraid I'll be as big fool as some of these gold bug preachers and vote for Bryan, as they do for McKinley. My indignation reaches boiling point when I see the Eastern folks assuming a superior understanding of this financial question, also when I read the drivel about Supreme Court decision. No one advocates not submitting to its decision as long as it stands. The effort to have it reversed is all within law and precedent.

Still another letter from a New York minister says:

The danger of the age is materialism, and your advice all tends to minimize the spiritual and emphasize the material, and the result can only be less faith in the supernatural, less spirituality in the churches. While, alas! some already are, I trust the day is far distant when the pulpit will come to the level of some of our religious organs for merely political polemics.

If I thought it my duty to preach on the gold question I should ask Ingersoll to help me, for he knows in a minute more about these matters than many of us ministers do in an hour.

THE VIEWS OF THE LAITY.

The foregoing specimens, perhaps, will suffice to represent our ministerial critics. If those who regard the issues at stake as these brethren do have supposed that we advised them to preach about these issues, then we have been misunderstood. No minister ought to preach on topics of which he is confessedly or conspicuously ignorant. The efforts of some men to do this very thing have brought reproach on the Christian ministry.

Turning now to letters from laymen, we find most of them regarding present political questions as of deepest moral significance, though the majority of them seem to regard the financial question as the main one. A prominent Ohioan, who has frequently contributed to our columns, says:

For some reason or other the religious journals of the East, in the pending presidential contest, have been as blind and as violent against the principles represented by Mr. Bryan as Saul of Tarsus was against the followers of Jesus of Nazareth.

When Mr. Bryan is elected, which, as an old politician accustomed to calculating the drift of current forces I consider practically certain, I sincerely trust you will call a halt on your headlong opposition to what you have deemed "national dishonor and commercial anarchy," and stop long enough to take a comprehensive look at the other side of the shield. The rôle of Cassandra is not creditable to a great religious journal like The Congregationalist, which, notwithstanding its serious deflection into politics, I still deem one of the foremost in the world.

The restoration of silver to the coinage equally with gold is a great moral necessity, and its liberation from bondage is not a whit less essential than the abolition of slavery in the War of the Rebellion. William J. Bryan is a man of destiny as certainly as Abraham Lincoln or George Washington or Moses, and I have the faith to believe that deliverance from the bondage of the gold standard is at hand and the promised land of prosperity and peace. R. B.

A writer whose utterance indicates that he is a native of Kansas says:

Now we all know that there is too great a disparity in the distribution of property in this country. From 1861 to the present time the disparity has been increasing with great rapidity, and is still going on with a rapidity never known before. To change that state of things and make the distribution of property more even is certainly very desirable. And that is what Mr. Bryan and his party want to bring about. Is it your duty to try to prevent it?

The Congregational churches have long been regarded by people of the world as more proud than humble, more self-asserting than self-abased, more learned than pious, more disposed to arrogant assumption than cold facts. Do you not give them evidence of the above by the rank political partisan spirit you exhibit? I am a member of the Congregational church, but not of the pronounced partisan political type of The Congregationalist. I am not in affiliation with any political party. It would be very doubtful, if not impossible, for any one to maintain communion and fellowship with Christ and at the same time affiliate with and take an active part with either political party. B. F.

Iowa sends us this fraternal message:

Turn it any way you please, dear money favors the money loaner, and no one else, while cheap or a gradual inflated currency, with the increase of business always, is in favor of industry and the poor. You cannot find a writer on political economy who has any reputation as a writer but that will indorse this proposition to favor a religion that protects the poor and protects the weak against the strong. You may say the gold policy will do this, that it is only a matter of opinion; then we say you are very unfortunate in the antecedents of your leaders to carry out such a policy. We can't as a professed Christian follow your lead, but we can pray that God, in his infinite wisdom and mercy, will grant you light and be merciful to you in your sins against humanity. Hoping you will see the error of your ways and learn with the meek and lowly One of Israel to love the poor as well as the rich, we remain fraternally yours, W. H. L.

From more discriminating and intelligent observers we gain a still clearer idea of the intensity of feeling with which this campaign has been carried on in the West. Another Iowa correspondent, who, though not a Republican, said he should vote for McKinley, writes:

"The spirit of '76" is in their work. Many of them believe they are fighting the battle of liberty over again. All their patriotism, all their love of home and all their religion are in this struggle. The voices of good men quiver as they speak of it and of their fears as to the result.

To the Eastern man who lends good money at three or four or six per cent. it seems self-evident that he ought to have his money back in as good as he gave. But the Dakota or Nebraska or Kansas man, who pays three or four per cent. a month on money to pay interest on a loan already made at high rates, or to buy seed, and then finds himself in danger of losing his home, or, worse still, sees himself or his neighbors stripped of home, of teams and wagons, and even of the last cow, because the drought or the hail has caught him, is not at all sure to see it in that light. He hears much of "the crime of '73" and of the combination between Wall Street and London. He has constant lessons in the high freights on grain and stock, which often take all his profits and sometimes all his receipts and even more. Is it any wonder that he listens to the free silver man? X.

From Minnesota comes this item of personal experience:

My wheat was about a half crop, nine bushels to the acre, while the whole country (Red River Valley) is only one-third crop; price, fifty-two cents per bushel, higher at this time of year than for three years. I have hay for sale. It would not now bring me $1.75 per ton for my work of cutting, stacking and hauling to station for market. I have over 1,000 bushels of potatoes, that so far have compelled me to keep my boys, thirteen and fifteen years of age, out of school to harvest them, as the market shows no shipping demand at any price. Your article in paper of Oct. 8 leads me to speak of these last things, for it is quite correct in its surmisings as to the Red River Valley. A large number of my neighbors feel that the single gold standard enables capitalists to corner the money market, thereby preventing its free use in buying provisions or doing the work needed by the people. They feel at the same time that if silver also had free coinage then in times when gold was cornered silver would take its place and the equilibrium of prices would be maintained. There is a feeling among some, perhaps many, that we can never have high, or even good prices, with a single gold standard. For myself I have hope that McKinley may be elected, and that with a Republican Congress wise work will be done which will relieve the farming communities. C. B. K.

Perhaps we cannot better close this series of extracts than by these words from a teacher in one of our higher institutions of learning:

I would declare emphatically my belief that, if the election shall result as most of us hope it will, there will then confront the successful party, and all who love the republic, problems of a social and economic character which will task the wisdom and charity of the wisest and the best. Senator Lodge seems to have obtained new light by going among the people of the middle West and Northwest. It is native Americans who are back of the great movement which is so feared, and power is in their hands. They are patriotic, too.

But no one has so well diagnosed for the public the cause or causes as you have done, and I thank you. T. H. H.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE WOMAN'S BOARD.

Those who attended the twenty-ninth annual meeting of the W. B M. in Manchester, N. H., will look back on Nov. 3, 4 and 5, 1896, as memorable days in their spiritual life. From that week many Christian women will date a deeper personal consecration, a stronger and firmer faith in the compensations of missionary service, a truer admiration and reverence for the brave souls who are our representatives on the foreign field and a fresh enthusiasm and impetus for the progress of God's kingdom the world over. The presence of nearly a score of missionaries, five of them fresh from the baptism of fire and blood in Armenia, the privilege of being brought through Miss Child into close touch with the stations she visited on her recent tour, the spirit of advance which pervaded the branch reports as well as the public addresses, above all the spiritual blessing which was received at every session, combined to make this meeting one of the most impressive and inspiring that the Woman's Board has ever held.

That the board has been able to redeem all its pledges the past year, and indeed has never in its history been compelled to take a backward step, was cause for hearty thanksgiving. For the first time the treasurer could report in November a complete financial year of twelve months. The total receipts were $130,553. Miss E H. Stanwood's report of the home department gives the number of senior auxiliaries in the twenty-three branches of the board as 1,074, besides cradle rolls and other contributing societies. The field secretary, Miss Kyle, has traveled about 8,000 miles during the year, speaking 130 times in 120 churches. Several new auxiliaries and covenant bands have been organized and some flagging societies stimulated to renewed effort. During the past twelve months twenty-two missionaries have come to this country in pursuit of health and rest, and seven who had previously returned still remain. Four have gone back to their mission fields, six have severed their connection with the board, one has died and one has gone out for the first time under the auspices of the W. B. M. For the first time Miss Lamson is able to report one or more secretaries of junior work in every branch, a convincing proof that missionary activity among young women and children is constantly increasing. The cradle roll becomes more and more popular and the covenanters now number 1,850. The goodly sum of $21,054 has been contributed from junior sources.

Since steady growth is an indication of healthy, vigorous life, we must regard the survey of the foreign field prepared by Miss L. M. Fay, Mrs J. O. Means and Mrs. E. E. Strong as hopeful, though the call for new buildings, enlarged accommodations, additional teachers and Bible women, from Africa, China, Spain and many other parts of the world, was somewhat overwhelming. The story of the year in Turkey was too terrible to dwell upon, but the amount of school work accomplished in spite of all the excitement, terror and bloodshed was marvelous, and not a woman in the audience but was thrilled with joy and pride at the mention of the work of mercy and comfort and relief which some of our brave women have unflinchingly carried on. The board now has under its care in all fields 117 missionaries, eleven assistant missionaries, thirty-three girls' boarding schools, 255 day schools, in whole or in part, and 162 Bible women.

The program for the public meetings was a rich one, and those who prepared it deserve credit not only for bringing the members of the board into touch with types of the loftiest womanhood, but for skillfully arranging the order of the speakers that the severe tension caused by the tragic recital of Turkish outrages might be relieved by an address in a lighter vein or by a paper on a spiritual theme. The number of missionaries in attendance this year was unusually large, and it was a happy thought at one session to gather eighteen of them on the platform, where Miss Stanwood felicitously introduced one by one with some graceful personal words about each. As heads were bowed in prayer with a new realization of what these consecrated workers represent, a great throb of emotion moved all hearts and filled many eyes with tears.

But we were privileged to hear several of these missionaries tell of their own work. Mrs. W. M Stover's strong address on Why I Believe in Missions made a profound impression on her hearers and inspired them with new faith for the evangelization of West Central Africa. China was represented by Dr. Kate C. Woodhull, who told of the medical work in Foochow, and by Mrs. Isaac Pierson of the North China mission. When we looked into the attractive face of Miss Susan H. Olmstead as she was pleading enthusiastically for the American College for Girls in Constantinople, we could easily believe her statement that the seven years spent there had been the happiest of her life. "Keen-eyed, freed Bulgaria," to quote her own words, had a charming advocate in Miss Ellen M. Stone of Philippopolis, while poor, desolate, starving Armenia sent Mrs. C. H. Wheeler and Miss Emily Wheeler of Harpoot. Who can forget the triumphant smile on her worn, sad face and the ring in her voice when Mrs. Wheeler said: "How can the missionaries in Harpoot come home? It is not heroism but duty to stay."

It was a rare privilege to see and hear among the missionary speakers two whom the world has placed on its roll of modern heroines. One, a tall, matronly woman with a fine, strong face, we love to call the "Florence Nightingale of Japan." It was as much of a pleasure to see Miss Eliza Talcott as to hear her give in her quiet, modest way an account of her beautiful work among the Japanese soldiers in the hospitals of Hiroshima. The name of the other whom we delight to honor, Dr. Grace Kimball of Van, is known by every man, woman and child who has read of the Armenian relief work. It was at the one evening session of the convention that this woman, with her slender, girlish figure, grave, almost stern, face, and self-possessed manner told the story of the last two terrible years. An awed stillness fell upon the room when she came to the massacre at Van and said: "No one can ever write or tell you the horror of a Turkish massacre. Nothing can express what the people suffer from pure fear. That was worse than anything else." And again, when she declared with a set, despairing face: "I see no hope for the Armenians except extermination. But relief work must be kept up. Even if they are killed tomorrow they must have bread today." But more than all Dr. Kimball said was what she did not say—the self-repression, the consideration for her hearers which kept her from giving harrowing details, the scenes simply suggested—these were what gave her address its real power.

Of the other addresses none were more enjoyable and helpful than Miss Child's graphic, racy descriptions of her visits in India, China and Japan. The names of two gentlemen were found on the program, Dr. J L. Barton, who brought greetings from the American Board, and Mr. Luther D. Wishard, whose theme was the evangelization of the world in this generation. One telling sentence of his deserves to be quoted: "If we should put as much enthusiasm and force into the work of saving the world that we have the past few months put into saving our country from dishonor, there would be a great transformation." Of the hour devoted to a discussion of How can we place our missionary work on a higher spiritual plane, with addresses by Mrs. C. L. Goodell and Mrs. S. B. Capron, we can but say that it was a time when we truly sat together in heavenly places. But indeed the inspiring and uplifting presence of the Holy Spirit was manifest, not only in the devotional hours, but in every session, from the delegates' meeting on Tuesday to the closing prayer Thursday afternoon.

A new treasurer, Miss S. L. Day, to succeed Miss Carruth, who resigned, and a new assistant treasurer, Mrs. W. H. Fairchild, were the most important changes in the list of officers. An invitation was accepted to meet next November in New London, Ct.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, NOV. 6.

About a hundred ladies gathered in Pilgrim Hall, many of whom had just come from the Manchester meeting full of the spirit of those wonderful days. Miss E. S. Gilman presided and read Scripture selections which speak of God's love to man and of the love which prevails among the followers of Christ. It was a prayerful hour. Several missionaries were present.

Mrs. Stover of W. Central Africa read two very interesting letters from Cato, a native pastor, whom she and Mr. Stover found an ignorant lad in their early missionary life and who is a good illustration of the possible power of missionary work. He is ready for anything, even to building a bridge for Dr. Bower to cross a stream while she sits all day upon the bank waiting for the work to be accomplished. Mrs. Stover also sang two hymns in the Umbundu language set to native music. The people are so musical that the children even "cry to a tune."

Dr. Woodhull of Foochow gave some incidents connected with her work. Miss Olmstead of Constantinople spoke of the great aim of the American College for girls in its efforts to develop in the students symmetrical Christian character, of the attendance at the Sunday evening service which has recently been made voluntary and of the prayer meetings which are held regularly and the flourishing missionary society.

Miss Talcott of Japan endeavored to dispel the impression which prevails in some quarters that there is nothing left for missionaries to do in that country and even asked that more single women and some new families be sent out. Miss Hannah Woodhull of Foochow, Miss Colby and Mrs. Pedley of Japan and Miss Stone of Bulgaria were also introduced.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

We heartily commend the finding of that Minneapolis council. It is quite time for a reaction in the matter of short pastorates.

Was the action of that Washington presbytery in absorbing those Welsh Congregational churches exactly in accordance with denominational comity?

The experiment in ecclesiastical farming just tried by a Minnesota church might succeed even better in other localities, or at a more favorable time financially than the fall preceding a presidential election.

It would have been difficult for that church in New Mexico to find a more inspiring substitute for a bell than the brass band, whose stirring strains called the people together to celebrate the dedication of its new edifice.

We wonder if there is a church in the country better provided with wheels than the one referred to in our news from Colorado? If the riders are as thoroughly animated and guided by the Spirit as were the wheels Ezekiel tells of [ch. 1: 20], that church will speed Zionward with marvelous swiftness.

For every need somewhere exists the satisfaction, though demand and supply are sometimes wide apart. To bring them together is the mission of the Mutual Help Bureau connected with Plymouth Church, Minneapolis—an unpretentious but practical feature of the institutional church which merits wide duplication.

The spirit of dedication seen in a number of items this week is particularly gratifying. It is not only pleasing to see the individual church glad at the achievement of what at the outset may have seemed, and in some instances really was, a tremendous undertaking, but it is comforting to the denomination to find its people conveniently housed just at this season, when best facilities for growing work are most needed. The unwillingness manifest so often to consecrate debts with new buildings marks the meeting houses of many of our young, weak churches as monuments to the mettle and perseverance which is the birthright of the Pilgrim stock.

BROOKLINE'S NEW CHURCH.

Peculiar interest attached to the exercises in connection with the formal recognition of a new church at Brookline last week Wednesday and the installation of its first pastor.

REV. H. G. HALE.

To begin with it is the only Congregational church in the United States that bears the name of Leyden—a name arrived at after much canvassing of other appellations such as the Church of the Redeemer, Plymouth, Pilgrim and Wycliffe. The final decision, in which all minds gracefully acquiesced, was due not merely to a desire to have an uncommon name, but to a conviction that it is proper to link the new enterprise at the outset with Congregational history and traditions by bestowing a name that calls to mind a noteworthy period in the life of the Pilgrims.

Another distinctive thing about the new church is that it represents, to some extent, the first church planting in this vicinity on the part of the Boston Congregational Church Union, organized last spring to do a work of extension and sustentation both in the city itself and in adjacent places. Moreover, the location of the enterprise, in the midst of a charming and rapidly growing residential section, the nearest other church of our order being over a mile away, promises success provided favorable external conditions are supplemented, as they are sure to be in this case, by persistent labor on the part of the new organization itself. From the time that the first afternoon services were started to the holding of the council last week just a year and one day had elapsed, and during that period fifty-five persons have come forward desiring to associate themselves in the undertaking, while a good-sized Sunday school has come into being and a weekly prayer meeting, with an average attendance of fifty, is being sustained.

Some of these points were perhaps in the minds of the brethren as, in response to letters missive, they came together in the pretty little Beaconsfield Casino, which is to serve as the home of the church until it has an edifice of its own. At any rate after the council had organized, with Dr. Arthur Little as moderator and Rev. W. R. Campbell as scribe, the reasons justifying the forward step were amply and cogently set forth by Mr. George E. Adams, who voiced the wishes of the neighborhood and its provisional committee, of which he has been the efficient chairman. The creed, by-laws, form of admission of members and other necessary documents were then submitted to the council, being read by Dr. R. W. Hastings, the clerk of the provisional organization. The council then voted to proceed without a recess to the examination of Rev. H. G. Hale. He read a paper about twelve minutes in length, in which was recorded the positive convictions of a mind open to truth, tolerant of inquiry, cautious as to non-essentials, but in vital possession of the fundamentals of evangelical Christianity. There was a little questioning which served only to deepen the general impression of Mr. Hale's candor, reverence and whole-souled consecration to the work of seeking and saving men. After a delightful interruption of formal proceedings for a moment or two, caused by the presentation of four children for baptism who were thereby constituted "charter babies," the council in private session gave its unanimous approval to the organization of the church and to the installation of Mr. Hale as pastor.

The evening brought a large number of friends and well-wishers of the new enterprise, quite a delegation coming from Harvard Church and from Allston, and several of the in-town churches being represented as well in the congregation. The precedent of a sermon was departed from. Instead five short, beautiful and appropriate addresses were made. Professor Harris reminded the church of its Christian and Congregational birthright and privilege. Rev. E. M. Noyes extended the fellowship of the churches, and made the timely suggestion that the obligations of partnership in a common work ought to be more generally recognized by the fraternity of churches hereabouts. Dr. G. A. Gordon addressed the pastor, and his solemn and hope-laden words were a bugle call to high endeavor and trust in God and in the future. Dr. W. H. Davis gave Mr. Hale the right hand of fellowship, and no one could doubt the sincerity of his simple, affectionate, tender greeting. Mr. S. B. Capen spoke heartily and inspiringly in behalf of the Church Union. The prayer of installation was offered by Dr. W. E. Barton and that of recognition of the church by Dr. Little, who presided felicitously over the exercises of the day and evening. Two events of the evening were specially impressive—the reception of five persons, two of whom were young men, on confession of their faith, and the formal taking of the covenant by the entire church, the pastor reading it and the people assenting.

The charter membership of fifty-five persons represents previous association with at least a dozen churches. The largest single contribution, fifteen, comes from Union Church, Boston, but Shawmut and Berkeley Temple send several. It is of interest just at this time to know that the welfare of this enterprise had always been close to the heart of Dr. Quint. He preached at the Casino in the spring, and he had been consulted with reference to every technical point respecting the exact process of organization. It was one of the special regrets of the last day of his life that his physician forbade his attending the council on the morrow. In all probability he would have been the moderator, but two hours before the dawn of the day to which he had so eagerly looked forward he passed to the life immortal.

AN INSTALLATION AT NEWARK.

The First Church, Newark, N. J., over which Rev. J. A. Chamberlin, Ph. D., has just been installed, was organized in 1852, and was then the only Congregational church on the Atlantic slope between New York city and the Gulf of Mexico.

About three years ago the church left the center of the city, now given up to business, and built and dedicated, free of debt, a new edifice a mile and a quarter away, valued at about $80,000. The recent council was convened Oct. 28, and was composed of the churches of the North New Jersey Conference.

Dr. Chamberlin is a graduate of Beloit College and of Chicago Seminary. He took a

our years' post-graduate course, three years at Yale and one at Wisconsin University. His unwritten statement or confession, as he called it, occupied about forty minutes and exhibited him as in close sympathy with modern thinking as respects theology and sociology. Many questions were asked by members of the council and answered with more or less explicitness and satisfaction. The examination throughout was unique

After the council retired discussion followed which resulted in a unanimous vote to proceed with the services of installation. The sermon, from the text Ps. 130: 7, was by Rev. S. M. Newman, D. D., of Washington.

A feature of the evening service not usual in Congregational installations was a statement read to the pastor setting forth his duties and responsibilities to his charge, which Dr. Chamberlin accepted, and also a paper addressed to the congregation setting forth its duties to the pastor, the church rising and accepting. Coming from his late field of labor in Minnesota, the new pastor has for the last two months been preaching to large and interested congregations, and the prospects for the future of the church are encouraging. A GLAD DAY FOR GALLUP, N. M.

The building of a new meeting house has been such an uncommon occurrence in this region during the financial depression as to make of special interest the dedication, Nov. 1, of the house of worship at Gallup. This is a coal mining town on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, 158 miles west of Albuquerque; with a population of 2,000. Congregational work was begun in February, 1895, and Rev. P. A. Simpkin took it in charge March 1 of that year. A union Sunday school was continued until Jan. 1, 1896, when a separate organization was effected. The church now has a membership of 61, and the S. S. attendance averages 75 and has several times exceeded 100. The schoolhouse and public halls have served for temporary quarters. Only by heroic effort and great sacrifice has the meeting house been erected. It is a frame building with stone foundation, without carpet, pew or bell, and is temporarily fitted with benches. It will seat 250 and cost, with lot, $2,300, $1,000 of which was given by the C. C. B. S., and the balance has all been raised. In lieu of a bell the people were called together for the dedication services by the band playing hymns. Supt. E. H. Ashmun preached in the morning and Mr. Simpkin in the evening. A dedicatory hymn was sung, composed for the occasion by the pastor. To him is due in no small degree the signal success of the enterprise in the face of great difficulties. E. H. A.

Three German hymns, including "A mighty fortress is our God," and a portion of the epistle to the Galatians were read. In the evening a great congregation gathered at the First Church, filling its spacious auditorium and representing the entire force of Protestantism in the city. Again German music was heard, and especially Luther's hymn. Short addresses were made by clergymen of various denominations. President McLean and Professor Foster represented the seminary and Congregationalism. A fine series of Luther views were shown by stereopticon. The meeting closed with singing America.

Dr. Alexander McKenzie preached the sermon and Dr. Smith Baker offered the prayer. An historical sketch of the work and planning for the undertaking was given, and Rev. A. E. Winship gave an address, soliciting contributions to complete the payments, and receiving in response over $1,100. Other remarks were made, and the pastor, Rev. Both bodies received additions to membership on communion Sunday, the one worshiping at the hall receiving eight on confession and one by letter, the other receiving five, all on confession.

CLINTON.—First held special services each Sunday morning in October, devoted, successively, to The Bible School, The Y. M. C. A., Old People's Day and the American Board. In the evening a series of three sermons on Centers of Early Christianity has been given.

NEW BEDFORD.—North. Last Sunday resolutions expressing grief at the death of Dr. A. H. Quint were passed. He was a former pastor in this parish, and his death is regarded not only as a loss to it, but to the entire Congregational body of churches.

FALL RIVER.—Central. Rev. Eldridge Mix, D. D., supplied the pulpit and administered the communion for his former parishioners Nov. 1. There was present the largest number of communicants in attendance at any one time since he left. The church has engaged Mr. J. B. Richardson as an assistant of its missionary, Rev. E. A. Buck. He is a graduate of the Springfield Training School, and is proving an acceptable and efficient co-worker.

WORCESTER.—Pilgrim. Institutional work has been taken up with enthusiasm. Already the Cadets Club, three classes in the gymnasium, sewing school and kitchen garden classes have been started. The pastor's normal Sunday school class on Friday nights numbers more than 50.——Piedmont. The recently organized Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip has its complement in the Band of Martha and Mary organized among the women. A special class for Bible study has been inaugurated under the supervision of Prof. A. W. Edson of the State S. S. Association.——Hope is holding a series of evangelistic services, under the leadership of Rev. H. W. Pope of the Christian Workers Association of New Haven. There has been much interest in the church of late and several have begun the Christian life.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. The offer of the church to Milton A. Dixon to act as the Bible school superintendent, as stated in an item last week, has not been accepted by him.

Maine.

BANGOR.—Central has recently instituted a series of Sunday evening services in the auditorium. Music by a chorus and orchestra and a short address by the pastor are among the leading features. Nov. 5 was the occasion of an enjoyable reception by the church to the pastor and his wife, Rev. and Mrs. J. S. Penman. Notwithstanding the severe storm, a large number were present. The pastor has just completed two years of faithful service. The church has been built up and strengthened in many ways.——Hammond Street. The pastor, Rev. H. L. Griffin, is following up the Moody meetings recently held in the city by a people's praise service Sunday evenings.——Rev. W. E. Noyes, with a quartet of children from the Little Wanderers' Home, Boston, held a service in the Y. M. C. A. rooms and in several churches in the city Nov. 8.

THOMASTON.—Under the leadership of the pastor, Rev. C. D. Boothby, 26 young men have formed a social, literary and athletic club. They hope to provide an attractive and wholesome place for young men and a gymnasium for physical development.

HOLDEN AND DEDHAM.—Rev. H. A. Freeman and family are now settled in the parsonage. This field is wholly occupied by the Congregational church, no other denomination holding services.

The Scarboro church debt has been canceled, to the great satisfaction of the society.

New Hampshire.

HENNIKER.—A mutual council to consider the case of Rev. F. L. Allen, the late pastor, convened Nov. 2, and after a prayerful consideration of the facts presented in their finding, "the council feels itself compelled to state that Rev. F. L. Allen is unworthy to longer remain in the Christian ministry, and we do therefore approve the action already taken by the church declaring its pastorate vacant, and we publicly withdraw from him the fellowship of the churches which was extended to him by the council that ordained him, and depose him from the Christian ministry, and we disclaim all further responsibility for him in ecclesiastical relations." The deepest sympathy was tendered the church in their trying experience, and gratification was felt at the expressions of penitence on the part of Mr. Allen.

BENNINGTON.—The repairs on the house have been completed with manifest improvement. The report of the treasurer is gratifying. The total receipts were $938 and expenditures $859. Of the amount raised the women furnished $238. The rest came from nearly the entire Protestant community and some from other than Protestants.

PEMBROKE.—Through the generous offer of Deacon G. B. Little, supplemented by various contributions of labor and money, a new furnace and heating apparatus for the warming of the audience-room of the church is going in, much to the gratification of the people.

Vermont.

BURLINGTON.—First. A well-attended reception at the chapel recently served as a favorable opportunity for enlarging acquaintances.——College Street enjoyed like opportunities at its reception for strengthening its hold on new members.——The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the two churches are preparing a relief box for the Armenians.

The Hinesburg church has completed repairs on its house, costing over $200.——The Ladies' Benevolent Society in Orwell held a recent birthday reception and netted about $125.——The Rochester Ladies' Aid Society cleared over $100 for the chapel debt at a recent fair.——The meeting house in Stowe has been repaired quite extensively of late, the improvements including a slate roof and painting within and without.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Plymouth. Rev. S. H. Woodrow has just entered upon his second year as pastor. During his first year with the church he received 48 new members. The institute is now holding a course of lectures on Sunday evenings on Some Noted Johns, the characters being taken up chronologically.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

EAST ROCKAWAY.—Bethany. A harvest service was recently held with beautiful decorations and appropriate sermons preached by the pastor, Rev. T. S. Braithwaite. The Congregationalist Thanksgiving Service was used in the evening with great acceptance. The offering was for the A. B. C. F. M. The ladies' society through a fair has raised money enough to paint both meeting house and parsonage.

RICHFORD.—Handsome stone flagging has taken the place of the decayed plank walk in front of the church premises here. Oct. 25 the church observed harvest Sunday. The rooms were decorated with harvest fruits, grains, etc., and the services were appropriate to the day.

New Jersey.

PLAINFIELD.—The officers and teachers of the Sunday school were publicly installed at a service for morning worship. The pastor, Rev. C. L. Goodrich, and one of the deacons addressed them; a covenant was repeated by them and the congregation responded with Scriptural words of blessing.

NEWARK.—Belleville Avenue. While this church is mourning over the approaching departure of its pastor to the Union Church, Boston, the First Church is rejoicing in the outlook for renewed prosperity under its recently installed pastor, Rev. James A. Chamberlin, whose installation exercises are described elsewhere.

THE SOUTH.

Maryland.

BALTIMORE.—First. A Men's Guild has just been formed whose object is to advance Congregational interests among the city churches.——Second. Rev. C. H. Crawford, late of Hammond, La., has accepted a call to the pastorate, and on Thursday evening a reception was tendered him and his daughter. A welcome was extended by the church and his fellow city pastors.——Canton. The fifth anniversary of the church has just been celebrated by a week's special meetings. Most important among the church interests were mentioned the C. E. Society work and the night school for working boys, 300 or 400 of whom have been reached by its influence.

THE INTERIOR.

Illinois.

TUNNEL HILL.—Fairview closed the work of a little more than its first year Oct. 25 with the dedication of its house of worship. The church is located in a thickly settled community, which has heretofore been poorly supplied with gospel privileges. This work was started by Rev. J. J. Watson, now general missionary of the Illinois H. M. S., in a booth erected on the banks of Beaver Creek. Afterward the gospel tent was used, and Evangelist Purdue took charge of the services, and the work culminated in the organization of a church. The day of dedication was bright and beautiful, the house was filled, many outside being unable to gain admission. The sermon was preached by Supt. James Tompkins. A collection sufficient to pay all indebtedness and to purchase needed furniture was cheerfully given. The other parts of the service were conducted by the pastor, Rev. C. L. Westman, and General Missionary Watson. Miss Watson led the praise service with her autoharp This church has a wide field of labor, and already has the largest Sunday school in the county.

JOHNSON CITY.—This is a new town on the Chicago, Paducah & Memphis Railroad. The church dedicated its neat house of worship Oct. 18. Services were held Saturday evening and all day Sunday. Addresses were given, the dedicatory sermon was preached and the prayer offered by Superintendent Tompkins. The small indebtedness on this property was quickly disposed of and enough added to procure a needed organ. The church is much encouraged, and will go forward vigorously with its work in this open field.

Michigan.

WOLVERINE.—A sadness pervades this church, owing to the death of Mr. Anson Martin, a young man of great promise, who only five weeks ago preached his first and last sermon for this church, and who had accepted a call to the pastorate. Mr. Martin was 22 years old and son of Rev. Joel Martin, who has acted for some time as general missionary in the upper peninsula.

DETROIT.—The pastors decided some time ago to hold a regular monthly fellowship meeting. The first was held last week Monday evening at the Ste. Clairie Hotel, with dinner. The time was delightfully spent.——First. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton has returned from the East after a 10 days' sojourn among his friends. He brought his family with him, and they are now comfortably settled in their new home.

Central Michigan Institute met at Lansing, Oct. 26. The attendance was good and the discussion on The Duty of Our Government Towards Our Missionaries in Turkey was animated.

Wisconsin.

BELOIT.—First. Rev. G. R. Leavitt, D. D., last Sunday completed his first year in this pastorate. Sixty persons have been added to the church, and the year has been fruitful in many ways.——Second. Oct. 25 was observed as Old Folks' Sunday and a harvest concert appropriately closed the day.

APPLETON.—First. Dr. John Watson lectured and preached recently for the pastor, Rev. John Faville. Some of his auditors traveled 250 miles to hear him.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—Bohemian. The corner stone of the new edifice was laid Nov. 5, the pastor, Rev. Edmond Wrbitzky, with Rev. Drs. Michael Burnham, J. H. George and C. S. Sargent participating in the services. Among the articles placed in the box were a photograph of the sword with which the Christian Bohemian noblemen were beheaded, the Bible and the confession of faith in Bohemian and a printed sketch of the church, a copy of the Pravda, published in Chicago, and a short history of the Bohemian Church, prepared in that language by the pastor.

Iowa.

GRINNELL.—During the five years' pastorate of Rev. E. M. Vittum, just closed, the membership has increased from 711 to 936, the whole number received being 456. The benevolences have advanced each year, the total for the five years being about $17,000. There has been a decided increase also in the Sunday congregations, the enlarged seating capacity furnished by putting in galleries being needed almost every Sunday.

BUFFALO CENTER.—Rev. N. L. Packard recently held special services for three weeks in a country neighborhood, a number of hopeful conversions resulting.

VICTOR.—Rev. W. B. Payne, pastor, has received 23 to membership during the past year. In no former year has there been a larger gain.

Improvements costing about $1,100 have been made on the edifice of the German church, Davenport, during the past year. Rev. C. F. Finger is pastor.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Plymouth. Fourteen persons united at the last communion, including the pastor, Dr. D. N. Beach, and his wife. Of these two came on confession, one the daughter of the pastor. A "Mutual Help Bureau" brings members of the congregation needing work, Christian homes, etc., in touch with those able to help them. Dr. Beach preached upon city and national politics the Sunday evening before election.——First Scandinavian. Interest is increasing with the coming of the new pastor, Rev. C. B. Bjuge. The hard times, which have thrown many of the members out of work, together with the crowding in of one or two other churches, have retarded growth, but present indications are favorable.——Swedish Mission Temple. Rev. J. G. Princell has closed his work here, owing to financial embarrassment in the church. At present the people do not see how to pay the large debt upon the building. Mr. Princell was commissioned by the C. H. M. S., the church being in sympathy with Congregationalists, though not formally connected with the denomination. A new pastor has been called and the work will go forward. With returning financial prosperity it is hoped that enough money can be raised to meet the floating indebtedness.——Fremont Avenue. The council called Oct. 30 to advise the church with respect to the resignation of its pastor, Rev. James McAllister, unanimously advised him to withdraw his resignation and to remain with his people. This was in view of the unanimous desire of the church to retain their pastor and the fact that the pastorate had been happy and successful. Mr. McAllister had already accepted the call to Alpena, Mich., but acquiesces in the advice of the council and asks to be released by the Alpena church. In the view of the council the tendency to short pastorates needs to be checked.

GLYNDON.—This church, the only one in the community, has been embarrassed in its finances. In the spring a quarter section of land was set apart for its use and worked by the different members, the proceeds to go to the running expenses of the church. At one time 53 horses were at work preparing the ground for flax. Owing to wet weather after harvest and a drop in the price of flax, the net proceeds are only about $350.

BELVIEW.—Rev. G. E. Northrup, who is doing missionary work at this and other points, has secured a new meeting house, which is already inclosed and will soon be completed. Church organization will follow. This is the only English-speaking enterprise in the community.

Kansas.

OSBORNE AND DOWNS.—The pastor spends alternate Sundays on each field. At Downs an evening service on the Sunday when there is no preaching is carried on by the members with marked success, both as to audiences and interest. A card containing these lay services for three months is published and the following are among the topics for October and November: Is It a Sin for People to Live Without Striving to Grow Wiser and Better Each Day? How Should We Spend the Sabbath Day? What Do We Learn from the Parable of the House Built on a Rock? There is a prepared opening address, followed by discussion.

OBERLIN.—This frontier church has been self-supporting from the start. During the last 10 months it has raised $657 for all purposes, including $116 by the Ladies' Aid Society. The place of worship has been changed from the courtroom to an attractive apartment in a well-located brick block.

ELLIS.—The resignation and departure of the pastor, Rev. J. W. Cone, are generally regretted. In spite of crop failures and business depression the church has prospered financially. It is practically out of debt and has recently bought lots suitable for a parsonage.

LONGTON.—Rev. Owen Umstead finds the work opening hopefully. A Thursday evening normal class, in which the pastor uses the blackboard freely in outline work and map study of the Holy Land, attracts an interested audience.

MOUNT AYR.—Preaching service is held once in two weeks, and a meeting under the auspices of the active C. E. Society on the intervening Sundays.

At Dial a sermon is read on alternate Sundays when the pastor is in another field. The meeting house is undergoing repairs.——Parsons church has added 25 members during the last six months, and it is expected that others will soon unite.

Nebraska.

LONG PINE.—This church, which had been a long time pastorless when Mr. J. M. Andress came, is responding with zest to his call for service, and there is increased interest along all lines. Ten new members have been elected, six of whom were welcomed to fellowship Nov. 1, the other four having been unavoidably detained.

ALMA.—This pastorless church was greatly encouraged by the accession, Nov. 1, of 12 members, eight on confession. Supt. Harmon Bross preached and administered the sacrament.

New Mexico.

WHITE OAKS.—Though the town has been practically without an income for six months, owing to an accident to the principal mine, and a third or more of the inhabitants have moved away, yet the church is fairly prosperous except financially. It finds itself unable, however, to raise the salary of the pastor, Rev. J. A. Hollars, who has been doing excellent work. He is, therefore, compelled to resign and will close his work Dec. 1. This will be a severe blow to the church, which may be compelled to close its doors. Archbishop Chapelle on a recent visit spoke in the Congregational edifice.

PACIFIC COAST.

Washington.

EAGLE HARBOR.—The new house of worship was dedicated Nov. 1, Supt. Samuel Greene preaching the sermon. Supt. A. J. Bailey had charge of raising the unpaid balance of the cost and offered the prayer of dedication. About $200 were paid on the spot, which, with $350 from the C. C. B. S., covers last bills. The edifice and lots, which in other years would have cost $2,500, have been secured for $1,600. The church has also a fine parsonage.

WALLA WALLA.—A council met Oct. 25 to organize a German church. The body consisted of representatives of German churches in the State, including those of Fresno, Cal., and Portland, Ore.

The foundation of the new meeting house at Pleasant Prairie has been laid. Mrs. E. J. Singer preached acceptably for this church Oct. 18.

Two small Welsh churches have voted to go over to the Presbyterians, and, although it was clearly shown that this action was brought about by misrepresentations, and no proper opportunity was given for the removal of any real grievance, they were received by the presbytery.

THANKSGIVING, NOV. 26.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S PROCLAMATION.

The people of the United States should never be unmindful of the gratitude they owe the God of nations for his watchful care, which has shielded them from dire disaster and pointed out to them the way of peace and happiness. Nor should they ever refuse to acknowledge with contrite hearts their proneness to turn away from God's teachings and to follow with sinful pride after their own devices.

To the end that these thoughts may be quickened, it is fitting that on a day especially appointed we should join together in approaching the throne of grace with praise and supplication.

Therefore I, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, do hereby designate and set apart Thursday, the 26th day of the present month of November, to be kept and observed as a day of thanksgiving and prayer throughout our land.

On that day let all our people forego their usual work and occupation, and, assembled in their accustomed places of worship, let them with one accord render thanks to the Ruler of the universe for our preservation as a nation and our deliverance from every threatened danger; for the peace that has dwelt within our boundaries; for our defense against disease and pestilence during the year that has passed; for the plenteous rewards that have followed the labors of our husbandmen, and for all the other blessings that have been vouchsafed to us.

And let us, through the mediation of him who has taught us how to pray, implore the forgiveness of our sins and a continuation of heavenly favor.

Let us not forget on this day of thanksgiving the poor and needy, and by deeds of charity let our offerings of praise be made more acceptable in the sight of the Lord.

Catarrh

Is just as surely a disease of the blood as is scrofula. So say the best authorities. How foolish it is, then, to expect a cure from snuffs, inhalants, etc. The sensible course is to purify your blood by taking the best blood purifier—Hood's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has permanently cured Catarrh in a multitude of cases. It goes to the root of the trouble, which is Impure Blood.

"I have been afflicted with nasal catarrh, which caused me severe headaches nearly every day. After trying numerous remedies without benefit, I decided to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. When I had taken three or four bottles I was completely cured of the catarrh and headaches."—N. G EGGLESTON, Rapid City, S. D.

ON STUMBLING.

A man stumbles because something gets in his way. But very often it happens that the thing over which he stumbles is himself. He gets in his own way. Then he sees only the result, not the obstacle.

Many people have thus stumbled by failing to realize the help they can have from a good book cabinet. It provokes the acquisition of books; it incites to the reading of books; it makes one's books twice as valuable because twice as accessible.

And if to your book cabinet you join a writing desk, the combination is sure to prove beneficial to you. No man can fail to reap a rich benefit from this close partnership of his reading and his writing.

The engraving shows one of the largest and most completely appointed Secretary Cabinets which has ever been constructed, yet we are offering it this season in a superb mahogany finish at only $65.

E. T. BOOTH, Esq.

Dear Sir: It is true that I am using the Booth "Hyomei" Pocket Inhaler, and I have the greatest pleasure in strongly recommending it.

Faithfully yours,
HENRY IRVING.

This is the Australian "Dry-Air" treatment of Asthma, Catarrh and Bronchitis. It will break up a common Cold over night. It

"CURES BY INHALATION."

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete by Mail, $1; (for foreign countries, add $1.00 postage); outfit consists of pocket inhaler, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm, for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute. In stock at the leading wholesale drug houses of Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago, also all leading business centers.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Imagine, if you please, a broad river reduced to a small, sickly stream by obstructions at its source and by lack of rain. A week, or perhaps better said two weeks, ago the broad, majestic current of American commerce was thus reduced. The obstructions at its source were the fear of the free silver campaign and the revolutionary character of the latter, while the lack of rain may be typified in the absence of confidence throughout the country.

But today, how different is the situation! Already the bed of the stream is gradually rising, and afar off may be heard the roar and the rush of the waters as the obstructions have been lifted. It cannot, therefore, be long before the river is again at its normal hight, and if the volume of the roaring sound counts for anything the water in the river will rise to an abnormal hight. In truth how can it be otherwise when the water has so enormously accumulated by being so long held in check?

The triumph of sound money has brought about this wholesome change in mercantile and financial affairs. Money that was hoarded is flowing back into enterprise and industry, mills are starting up, and orders for merchandise have already heavily increased. The idle will find employment, and unless the masses have plenty of work they have not money to spend, and unless this purchasing power exists there can never be any real prosperity.

The advance in the price of grain products has furnished the farmer with profits that were earlier unexpected, and gives him in consequence a surplus with which to buy the manufactured products of the East. It should not be overlooked that this is an agricultural country, and that consequently the prosperity of the farmer, the retailer and the mechanic are indissolubly linked together. Let the party in power or out have a fatherly care for the farmer, and the rest of the country will be able to take care of itself.

Business in all lines is now better, the volume is all the while swelling, and in our judgment the country stands upon the threshold of the largest boom witnessed since 1879–81. Outside of the election, the factors are peculiarly favorable in their bearing upon the general trade situation.

The hope of the future life has always nestled in the heart of the race and found wings upon occasion.—Ian Maclaren.

The Temple Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, having been thoroughly renovated, had an elaborate program of re-entering services last week. The pastor is Rev. Francis A. Horton, D.D., recently of the Union Church, Providence. The sum of $10,000 has been expended in repairs of the church building, and on the completion of the work a thank offering of $460 was made for home missions. Dr. Horton is to preach a course of 12 sermons on The Future Life—not a common pulpit theme at present.

GEORGE H. WILSON of New York is at the Quincy House, Nov. 12, 13, 14. Mr. Wilson is the inventor of an artificial eardrum that has gained him no little celebrity.

A RARE COMBINATION.—Adamson's Botanic Cough Balsam combines the most potent medical ingredients, and is a certain cure for the most obstinate and unyielding coughs, colds and all bronchial troubles leading to consumption. No case is hopeless, no matter how serious. Sold by all druggists.

CATARRH means danger, because if unchecked it may lead directly to consumption. Catarrh is caused by impure blood. This fact is fully established. Therefore, it is useless to try to cure catarrh by outward applications or inhalants. The true way to cure catarrh is to purify the blood. Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier, cures catarrh by its power to drive out all impurities from the blood. Thousands of people testify that they have been perfectly and permanently cured of catarrh by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

DR. QUINT'S FUNERAL.

The funeral was held Friday morning in the Allston church, of which he was a member, and where he worshiped the last Sunday of his life. The women of the church had made it more beautiful with their own offerings of love, and they served gracefully in arranging the many floral emblems and the patriotic regalia brought from afar. Back of the pulpit and at its sides stood the banners of the Loyal Legion and the many Grand Army posts in attendance, and the casket was wrapped in the stars and stripes. Seated in the pews were many of the best known of the younger and older clergymen of eastern Massachusetts, large delegations from the Masonic and military organizations of which Dr. Quint was either a member or had honorably and generously served, and many of the laymen and women of the Boston churches. The body bearers were comrades from the New Bedford Grand Army Post, of which Dr. Quint was the pioneer member, and the pallbearers were Messrs. Thomas Todd, C. E. Swett, S B. Capen, S. B. Shapleigh, F. H. Mudge and Judge H. W. Baldwin.

The pastor of the church, Rev. J. O Haarvig, offered the opening prayer, and later told of the profound sorrow which the Allston church suffered as it faced the certainty that it had lost the friend and member to whom it had never gone in vain for wise advice and Christian sympathy

Rev. A. E. Dunning named the many positions of responsibility in the Congregational denomination which Dr. Quint had filled so uniquely and so long, and he dwelt briefly but impressively upon the personal virtues of the dead man—his patience, his generosity, his loyalty to his friends, his wisdom, his ability to see all around a subject and far ahead, his sympathy for young men and his lavish service for the denomination, for churches and clergymen seeking counsel and for the peace of the churches.

Prof. Egbert C. Smyth of Andover Seminary described Dr. Quint's relations with Andover Seminary, first as a student, where he made a marked impression at a time when there were many strong men there studying, and later, when, as a Visitor and temporary instructor in homiletics, he came back to fill important positions requiring the most delicate tact and courage. How admirably Dr. Quint did his duty Dr. Smyth hinted, but did not fully describe.

The closing prayer by Rev. Dr. J. M. Wellman, Dr. Quint's classmate at Andover, was tender in its spirit and full of discriminating thought. After those who desired to had viewed the remains they went with the family and a few friends, escorted by the G. A. R. men of New Bedford, to Dover, N. H., where another service was held in the First Parish Church, which Dr. Quint joined when a boy. Rev. George E. Hall, D. D., pastor of the church, conducted the devotional exercises. President Tucker of Dartmouth College, Judge I. W. Smith, Dartmouth, '46—a classmate—and Rev. George B. Spaulding, D. D., of Syracuse, N. Y., delivered eulogies. Just at twilight, with solemn Masonic rites, his body was laid to rest in the Pine Hill Cemetery.

We shall continue its use in the work we are doing among the people in this section of our city."

WHAT IS BEING DONE FOR THE ARMENIAN REFUGEES.

The arrival in Boston on Sunday morning, Nov. 1, of a party of about fifty of the Armenian refugees who had been detained on Ellis Island awakens anew our interest in these unfortunate people. These men had had their tickets bought and had been put on board the cars by officers of the Salvation Army in New York and were met here by the Armenian Relief Committee. Some of them attended Shawmut Church in the morning. Temporary lodgings had been provided for them at 16 Waltham Street, and in the afternoon a religious service was held at that place. Mr. Jegalian, the pastor of the Berkeley Temple Armenian congregation, spoke in Armenian from the text, "Ye are the light of the world," and was followed by Dr. John Garzigian of Constantinople, who spoke in Turkish. Dr. Garzigian read from the book of Esther, pointed out that it was Esther's faith that saved her people and said, "We have trusted in man—in the Powers of Europe; let us put our trust in God as did Esther." When he said, "We are now in a land of freedom, in safety, but it makes me shudder when I think of the women and children still at the mercy of the persecutor," many of the men sobbed aloud. It was pathetic indeed to see these men, very different from the ordinary emigrant, with tears running down their dark-skinned faces, to feel that they had fled for their lives in defense of their religious faith, and then to remember that some Americans, in the full enjoyment of personal security, had been unwilling for them to land on our shores. The service closed with the Doxology sung in Armenian words.

Nearly all these men are young—few of them being over forty—and mostly unmarried. Most of them were prosperous merchants in Constantinople at the time of the massacre last August, when their shops were pillaged and their property destroyed. Among them are tailors, an electrical engineer, a silversmith, wood merchant, doctors, druggists, a dentist and a number of college students. Up to last Saturday about thirty had been sent out, and applications and letters of inquiry are being received daily.

Some have been sent to New Hampshire, some to the western part of the State and some to the Cape. Places secured so far have been for domestic and farm work. Miss Blackwell promised to be responsible for twenty-five and the W. C. T. U. for fifty. These fifty were sent to Revere on Saturday.

Besides the aid furnished by Americans the Armenians are helping one another. The Armenian Relief Association, organized two weeks ago and composed of seven prominent Armenian merchants of Boston, is doing all that can be done to raise funds and secure employment. One well-known merchant on Tremont Street has found places in his store for some six or seven, and even laborers who have been earning $3 or $4 a week are sharing this with their more needy countrymen. Mr. Gulesian is the executive member of the relief committee and will be glad to receive contributions of clothing and other supplies at 16 Waltham Street.

There are about 3,000 Armenians in Massachusetts, principally at Lynn, Worcester, Lawrence and Haverhill. In the vicinity of Boston there are about 500, of whom about 150 men and six or seven women are in the city proper. They are industrious, honest and frugal and almost never found among paupers.

The writer has for a number of years taught the English language to foreigners, including Germans, French, Italians, Portuguese, Russian Jews and other nationalities, but among them all she has found no men more intelligent and more eager to learn than the class of Armenians she is now teaching, few of whom have been in this country more than six months.

MISS ESTHER WHITTEMORE

Of Everett, Mass., aged seventy-eight years and ten months, daughter of the late William Whittemore, after an illness of four weeks, which was borne with Christian fortitude, fell asleep in Jesus Saturday morning, Oct. 24. She had been a devoted member of the Congregational church for more than fifty years, at one time was leader of the church choir, having a fine soprano voice, and for twenty-five years was a teacher in the Sabbath school. She leaves one devoted sister who has been her constant companion since childhood, and three brothers, to mourn her loss. A large circle of friends was present at her funeral services, which were conducted by a former pastor, Rev. G. Y. Washburn, and present pastor of the church, Rev. Arthur Patten. The beautiful floral tributes testified of the love and friendship of her many friends. Hers was a character of sterling Christian qualities. Scorning all the petty worldly vanities, she lived a simple, cheerful, Christian life, trusting in that Saviour with whom she now dwells, in her Father's house of many mansions.

Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep;
A calm and undisturbed repose,
Unbroken by the last of foes.

ESSAY ON STUMBLING.—In another column of this paper is an interesting essay on Stumbling. It shows that many people stumble from getting in their own way, and tells plainly how to get out of one's way. It is, altogether, an article well worth reading. It is contributed by the Paine Furniture Company in their announcement.

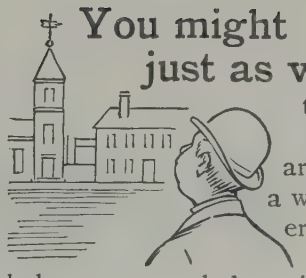
You might just as well



try to blow around a weather vane as to help some people by pointing out the right way. They won't see it. Even if you prove to them that it's the easiest way, and the safest, and cheapest, they won't walk in it. But this isn't so with all. It's only a few, comparatively. We're not complaining. Our offer explained more fully in The Congregationalist, Sept. 24th, Oct. 15th.

NOTE—The Larkin Soap Company have used the columns of The Congregationalist for two or three years past in advertising their "Combination Box of Soap" sent in connection with an oil heater, desk or chair. The publisher of this paper has written personally to a number of subscribers who have responded to the advertisement and purchased the soap. Without exception they state that they are perfectly satisfied with the soaps and with the business methods of the Larkin Co. The letters speak in praise both of the soap and of the premiums that accompany it.—The Congregationalist.

THE painter decorates the wall; the artist-in-needle-work decorates the furniture; the emperor decorates with a medal the faithful soldier; but dirt decorates all neglected things and places with its own peculiar badge—a badge of disgrace. Decorative art is a good thing if it does not lead people so high up that they cannot see the dirt that accumulates in the kitchen and in the corners. It is those housekeepers who use SAPOLIO that win the medal of honor and have houses and reputations free from the imputation of a decoration of dirt.

The Book of The Pilgrimage

An account of the remarkable tour of last summer to England and Holland under the auspices of THE CONGREGATIONALIST.

It was originally intended to publish this book exclusively for the use of the members of the party, but so many inquiries have come to us from other sources for a permanent record of the trip that we have decided to print a limited number of additional copies.

SUBSCRIPTIONS WILL BE RECEIVED UNTIL DEC. 1 AT $2.00 PER COPY—OR, SECURELY PACKED AND DELIVERED POST PAID, $2 25 AFTER DEC. 1 THE PRICE WILL BE $3.00. THE BOOK WILL NOT BE FOR SALE AT THE BOOKSTORES AND THERE ARE NO TRADE OR MINISTERIAL DISCOUNTS. THE PRICE WILL BE UNIFORMLY AS ABOVE.

THE BOOK OF THE PILGRIMAGE is a sumptuous quarto, printed on heavy coated paper, wide margins, uncut edges, and bound in white parchment paper. The text is accompanied by over sixty illustrations, many of them full-page, and about seventy portraits of distinguished men and women in England, to whom, as hosts, the Pilgrimage Party was indebted. In addition to this there are four group pictures of the party, including two of double-page size. There are over one hundred facsimile autographs, many of them of great interest, and including a characteristic letter of Ian Maclaren. The initial letters for each chapter have been drawn by Ipsen, who also supplied designs for the title-page, frontispiece, and finis.

The volume will be of unique interest, and worthy of the journey it chronicles, a journey which assumed an international significance and which cannot fail to have an important denominational value.

The book will be ready about December 4, 1896.

 It may be found necessary to close the $2.00 subscription list previous to Dec 1. The publishers reserve this right in view of the fact that the book is printed from type and the edition necessarily a limited one.

"Campaigning with GRANT"

A series of articles
BY Gen'l Horace Porter
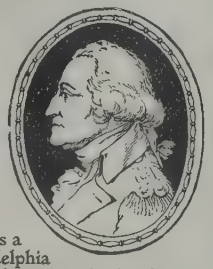
Begins in the November number of

THE CENTURY

NO man knew Gen. Grant more intimately than his aide and friend Gen. Horace Porter. He has been engaged for many years on this series of articles giving his recollections of Grant as a man and a soldier, and containing a series of striking pictures of campaign life and scenes enlivened with anecdote and flashes of characteristic humor. In this November number are first chapters of

A Great Novel of the American Revolution,

"HUGH WYNNE, FREE QUAKER,"



Sometime Brevet Lieut.-Colonel on the Staff of his Excellency General Washington."

By DR. S. WEIR MITCHELL.

Illustrated by HOWARD PYLE.

THIS powerful novel, Dr. Mitchell's masterpiece, is a story of the American Revolution and of Philadelphia society from 1753 to 1783. Washington, Franklin, Lafayette and other famous men, figure in it. It is safe to say that readers of this story will obtain from it a clearer idea of the people who were foremost in Revolutionary days and of the social life of the times than can be had from any other single source. It is not only historically accurate, but it is a most interesting romance of love and war. The hero serves on Washington's staff.

The November Century

now ready, contains first chapters of these serials and of Marion Crawford's new novel "A Rose of Yesterday," written especially for THE CENTURY. New features will be announced from time to time. Do not miss this November number,—sold everywhere; 35 cents. Yearly subscriptions (which should begin with this issue), $4.00. All dealers take subscriptions, or remittance may be made to

A. C. McCLURG & CO.

ITALY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By ELIZABETH WORMELEY LATIMER. Illustrated. 8vo, $2.50.

After a rapid glance at the early history of Italy, the author paints broadly the leading events of the early part of this century, and enters more into details in dealing with subjects closely belonging to the present day.

The New York Independent says of Mrs. Latimer: "She possesses in an eminent degree the power of calling up the past and setting it side by side with the present."

Mrs. Latimer's 19th Century Histories already published are:

Europe in Africa in the 19th Century,	$2.50
England in the 19th Century,	2.50
Russia and Turkey in the 19th Century,	2.50
France in the 19th Century,	2.50

PIERRETTE. By MARGUERITE BOUVET. Illustrated by Will Phillips Hooper. Small 4to, $1.25.

The story has enough of romance to make it delightful to the little ones, although it has none of the impossibilities of the fairy tale; and mothers will be glad to put it into the hands of their children, because it is both sweet and wholesome.

Other works of Miss Bouvet which have already become popular are:

Sweet William,	$1.50
A Child of Tuscany,	1.50
Prince Tip Top,	1.00
My Lady (for older readers),	1.25
Lady Marjorie's Love Story,	1.00

FAIRY STARLIGHT AND THE DOLLS. By ELIZABETH S. BLAKELY. Illustrated. $1.00.

A charming story of the impossible adventures of two little girls and their dolls in the fascinating realm of fairyland. The events are supposed to take place after the children have gone to sleep. The unusual situation affords much fun, and will greatly amuse the little ones.

AUDIENCES. A Few Suggestions to Those Who Look and Listen. By FLORENCE P. HOLDEN. 12mo, illustrated. 222 pages, $1.25.

"It is not easy to conceive that any one can put aside 'Audiences' without having become more firmly and more clearly cognizant of the truths and beauties of architecture, sculpture, painting, music, drama and literature. . . . The book should have for itself the largest possible of audiences."—Times, Washington, D. C.

SCIENCE SKETCHES. By DAVID STARR JORDAN. New and Enlarged Edition. 12mo, 287 pages, $1.50.

"The book in its present form comprises nearly 300 pages of pleasantly written popular science, in which the science has the advantage of being the real article, written by one who knows."—N. Y. Evening Post.

EATING AND DRINKING. By Dr. ALBERT H. HOY. 12mo, $1.50.

Dr. Hoy has given thirty years of study to the subject of foods and drinks and their effect upon the digestive organs and general well-being of the body. His conclusions are impartial and his reasoning lucid; untechnical language is employed, and no one should be ignorant of what this book contains. To medical men the researches and discoveries of the author in connection with the alkalinity of the blood will be of especial interest.

A SHORT HISTORY OF ITALY. By ELIZABETH S. KIRKLAND. 12mo, 475 pages, $1.25.

"A well-considered, thoroughly digested and readably written history of Italy has long been a desired thing, and now it is a reality. . . . Last week A. C. McClurg & Co. published Miss Kirkland's 'A Short History of Italy.' The history of Italy is begun in 476 A. D., and is traced to the present year. Directness, completeness and polished grace are the salient qualifications of this valuable book."—Morning Times, Washington, D. C.

Miss Kirkland's Histories already published are:

A Short History of France,	$1.25
A Short History of England,	1.25
A Short History of English Literature,	1.50

THE METHOD OF DARWIN. A Study in Scientific Method. By FRANK CRAMER. 12mo, 232 pages, $1.00.

Not to teach Darwinism, but to commend to all thinkers Darwin's exact and logical method in the pursuit of knowledge, is the object of this excellent work.

The Hartford Post says: "The reader will see anew the difficulties in the way of the scientific investigator, will understand why some most important facts have been undiscovered, and why false trails have seemed the right ones for years. The writer has given to his public a book for which they will be truly grateful."

NATIONAL EPICS. By KATE MILNER RABB. 12mo, $1.50.

Such a book as this will render valuable service to that large class of readers who have literary tastes, but who have not sufficient leisure from business cares for the indulgence of those tastes to the full. It gives an historical and descriptive sketch of each of the great epics of various nations, with a short bibliography of the same, and with illustrative extracts from the poems themselves.

KARINE. A Story of Swedish Love. Translated from the German of Wilhelm Jensen. (Tales from Foreign Lands.) 16mo, gilt tops, $1.00.

This latest addition to "The Tales from Foreign Lands,' Series is a thrilling tale of the time of Gustave Vasa, who himself is the hero of the book, and mingles delightfully the sweet love-story of Karine of Sweden with the warlike deeds of that eventful time.

The other books of this series are:

"Memories," "Graziella," "Marie," "Madeleine," "Marianella," "Cousin Phillis."

THE LIFE OF ROGER SHERMAN. By LEWIS H. BOUTELL. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

The valuable services that Sherman rendered are ample cause for national gratitude, and in return for them this timely publication will keep his memory green.

THE JOY OF LIFE. A Novel. By EMMA WOLF, author of "Other Things Being Equal." 12mo, 253 pages, $1.00.

This new story is likely to prove even more successful than that popular book, "Other Things Being Equal." Not until the very end of the last chapter will the reader find the thread which will lead to the key that is to explain it all.

Sold by booksellers generally, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of the price, by the publishers,

BIBLE STUDY UNION LESSONS

FOR 1897.

THE BIBLE STUDY UNION (or BLAKESLEE) LESSONS and the International Lessons for 1897 are both on the Acts and Epistles.

The imperative and growing demand for better methods of Bible Study, and the marked success of our lessons, have led us to prepare two New Courses for 1897, viz. :—

A Most Attractive Biographical Course:

THE THREE GREAT APOSTLES, PETER, PAUL, and JOHN.

Published in three Grades—Junior, Intermediate, and Progressive—with a Manual, making a Uniform Lesson for the Main School.

An Exceedingly Interesting Bible Class Course:

WEEKLY NOTES on these Lessons will appear in The Evangelist and Christian Work, of New York, The Watchman, of Boston, and other papers.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

THIS year draws to its close with peculiar reasons for thanksgiving. The war cloud between England and America which rose at its beginning has completely vanished. The harvest has been bountiful and is of greater value than for several years. The months of uncertainty concerning the business future of the country have passed away. Confidence is returning. Factories are being opened. Furnaces are being kindled anew. The currents of trade are flowing again and with increasing volume. Multitudes who have grown disheartened in enforced idleness are at work again. Hope is awakening and courage is growing everywhere. Our President and the governors of our States call on all the people to render thanks publicly to God, to celebrate his goodness in their homes and to show kindness to their fellowmen in need. These very acts will tend to enhance the new era of prosperity on which our nation is entering. Can we in honor do less on the coming Thanksgiving Day than to make these words of the Psalmist our own?

What shall I render unto the Lord
For all his benefits toward me?
I will take the cup of salvation,
And call upon the name of the Lord.
I will pay my vows unto the Lord,
Yea, in the presence of all his people.
. . . . . .
I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving,
And will call upon the name of the Lord.

The quality of Dr. Storrs's ministry in the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, was the theme of more than one discourse in that city and elsewhere last Sunday. Rev. Dr. Reuen Thomas of Brookline, preaching in the edifice where Dr. Storrs ministered before going to Brooklyn, explained his success in satisfying one congregation fifty years by showing that it was based on two essentials for any such tenure of office—high character and great and ever fresh intellectual power. Self-reverence, a quiet dignity and obedience to time-honored ideals inherited from his fathers also have had much to do with it. Dr. Storrs himself seems to feel that perhaps he is of a type that is rare now and doomed to pass away, for in his Sunday's sermon, reviewing his life in the Brooklyn pastorate, he sighed for the old days of plainer living and higher thinking, when "regeneration," the greater word, had not given way to "culture" in the vocabulary of good men, and enthusiasm for divine truth and living was greater than it is now. Dr. Storrs says he has seen Brooklyn grow from a town of 60,000 to 1,200,000 inhabitants and the nation "securely dominant on this hemisphere, and having a voice that carries weight and authority among all the nations of the world."

On another page we print the resolutions adopted by the Bay Conference with reference to the Dubuque Association. The action of the latter body is, so far as we know, without precedent in our denominational history. It has voted to receive to its membership, and assumed thus to restore to good standing in the Congregational ministry, one who is under suspension by a sister organization of equal authority. The question of the guilt or innocence of Dr. Brown becomes, in this relation, of minor importance. It is a question concerning which we have scrupulously avoided expressing any opinion. No advance whatever towards answering it, so far as appears, has been made by the action of the Dubuque Association receiving him into membership without the credentials which its own constitution requires. But a grave injury has been done to the fellowship of the churches, which must be borne not only by those directly involved but, if it be not soon repaired, by the churches of Iowa and of the entire denomination. We know of no case where a council has been called to settle difficulties between conferences of churches. But whether or not a council would be proper as a last resort, we earnestly hope it will not be thought necessary to call one to advise these two bodies of churches how to settle the difficulty which has arisen between them. Both of them include men of experience in our denomination who are devoted to its best interests. Their calm judgment, we are confident, will lead them to bring about an agreement which will strengthen our polity and which all the churches will approve.

The Salvation Army idea has been adopted into the Episcopal Church in the United States. An "army" which has existed for a year or more has taken an important forward step by the appointment of a Church Army Commission, consisting of several Episcopal clergymen of New York and Philadelphia to supervise the organization. Instead of deacons, clergymen and bishops, it is to have captains, majors, generals and other officers. Instead of churches it is to have posts, companies, regiments and brigades. A House of Evangelists has been opened near the Grand Central Station in New York city for the training of officers, where "instrumental and vocal music will be taught and practical rescue work," with "lectures in elocution, mannerisms and how to approach and win sinful persons." This movement has the approval of Bishop Potter and other leaders in the Episcopal Church. It is the first attempt in this country of a religious denomination to clothe its evangelistic work with military uniforms, titles and ideas. The experiment will be watched by many with sympathetic interest. If it shall prove that the army has valuable lessons to teach the churches, no doubt other denominations will follow this example in due time.

A few years ago the growth of the West in population was marvelous and the most common theme of orators. But the westward march of empire has come to a pause, if it has not retrograded. Since 1890 Massachusetts has gained nearly twelve per cent. in population and New Jersey nearly sixteen per cent. Iowa has gained seven and a half per cent. and Oregon about the same. Kansas has fewer inhabitants today than six years ago. These Western States planned for constant and increasing growth. They laid out cities, erected public buildings, organized colleges and churches to provide for the incoming millions. The millions have not come—the loss is great, the disappointment deep and pride as well as pockets suffer. The East has furnished a large part of the capital invested to take advantage of this growth which has not materialized—capital much of which has disappeared and more of which is yielding no return. It is not strange that each section should find a good deal of fault with the other, and propose experiments in legislation to get prosperity. But let us have patience. The natural resources of the West are as great today as ever. They will be developed more cautiously and wisely, but their worth will be realized. Capital will again flow into the West, its vast wealth will be utilized and prosperity will return. Let us not waste in fault-finding the strength needed to take advantage of new and better conditions.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST'S ARMENIAN ORPHANS' FUND.

The response to our plan, announced last week, for the relief of the Armenian orphans has been prompt and gratifying. Though less than a week has elapsed since our readers began to learn of the undertaking, $500 have come to us from various sources. This sum has already been passed over to Treasurer Wiggin of the American Board and transferred by cable to Harpoot, which has been selected as the first center of distribution. Its use there will be intrusted to the capable force of missionaries headed by Dr. C. F. Gates, and in all probability before the majority of our readers see these words the beneficent work of gathering, housing, clothing and feeding the needy orphans in Harpoot and vicinity will have been entered upon. At least fifty orphans will thus be entirely provided for during the trying winter months. Not a cent of the contribution is used in transmitting the funds. Could there be a more economical, swift and satisfactory method of bearing succor to the children of stricken Armenia? These children are the hope of Armenia, and relief furnished in the form which we have suggested means not only preservation of human life under decent conditions but the molding of character for all time.

This simple plan of aid has already received the heartiest indorsement in every quarter. The secretaries of the American Board and the Prudential Committee, prominent Armenian merchants in Boston and every one interested in and identified with the sufferers in Armenia have pronounced the movement one of the greatest timeliness and importance.

But this $500 is only a beginning. We want to raise ten times that sum before Christmas, if possible before Thanksgiving. How much deeper satisfaction we shall take in the old New England festival if we have done something to evoke gratitude from sorrowing, suffering souls in far-off Turkey. Our celebration next week will be doubly sweet if while we are participating in it we can have the glad consciousness that we have done something toward relieving the awful woes of the Armenian people.

Our first appeal is to the individual, but we think it eminently appropriate, also, for churches, Sunday schools and individual classes, as well as Endeavor Societies, to have a part in this undertaking. If any one desires to learn of the precise method by which relief is administered we would call attention to Secretary Barton's article on page 760. Just what individual gifts will accomplish is shown herewith.

Ten dollars will provide home, clothing and food for one orphan for five months or until the trying winter is over.
Five dollars will house and clothe one orphan for a year.
Three dollars will house one orphan for a year.
One dollar will house, clothe and feed one orphan for two weeks.

The individual subscriptions are acknowledged on page 772, and represent what has been received up to and including this week Tuesday morning, the time of our going to press.

ARBITRATION ACCEPTED.

The settlement of the Venezuela question is perhaps the most significant event of the year. When, last January, the people of the United States and England suddenly found themselves facing one another with a prospect of war, they felt a shock whose effects will long continue in both nations.

Few in either country knew anything about the boundary line concerning which they were told they might be called to fight. But the publication of President Cleveland's message and of the correspondence between the two governments flashed on the people the fact that their leaders were defying one another about unsettled claims to territory between Venezuela and Great Britain, and newspapers on both sides of the ocean declared war.

The vast financial losses which in this country immediately followed suggested to Americans what war would mean. The great problems of government pressing on England and her isolation from other European nations were not less suggestive there of what war would mean. The people in both countries quickly lost sight of the cause which might bring war, but they fixed their minds on its consequences. Some of the great advantages which already appear from what threatened vast disaster we will mention.

No other event in this century has done so much to draw together in friendship these two nations of one blood, one language, one religion and one controlling purpose to serve the human race. They understand and respect each other today more than ever before. They feel that war between them would gain little for either nation in comparison with what it would destroy for both, and that it would be the severest blow that could be given to the advancement of the world's civilization. This feeling is even stronger in England than in the United States. The members of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage last summer were made to realize this as they could not have done at home. The sense of brotherhood which found spontaneous expression wherever they went showed how profoundly the English nation was moved.

It is a great gain to the world that the popular estimate of the value of peace between these two leading nations should push aside the passion for war and at the same time should prize at its full value the honor of all parties concerned. It was the people who decided that the difficulty between their rulers should be settled in friendship, not by war. They had so great confidence in one another that they refused to fight. They said: "We are Christian nations. We can settle our difficulties on Christian principles." One of the experts employed by the Venezuela commission, while engaged in examining documents in Europe last summer, told the writer that no solution seemed possible which would satisfy both governments. Our President had demanded arbitration, with war as the only alternative. Lord Salisbury had positively refused arbitration on the terms demanded. Yet it was already certain that no other than a peaceful solution would be permitted by the people of either nation.

Again it was a great gain that the people and rulers saw that the questions at issue could not be decided by the popular voice. Knowledge of the conditions involved was necessary, knowledge which could be gained only through patient investigation by men trained for their work. Nations have fought terrible wars about questions concerning the merits of which neither knew enough to give an intelligent judgment. England and the United States will not hereafter fall into such wanton folly. Their example will have weight with other nations and measureless misery will be averted. The principle of arbitration has made a great advance this year.

The exact steps by which the settlement of the question will be reached do not yet appear to be decided. It is too soon to say how far this country has increased its responsibilities for other nations on this continent by its espousal of the cause of Venezuela and the interpretation which our Government has given of the Monroe Doctrine. But it is certain that substantial progress has been made toward unity among the nations. War has been shown to be more unreasonable than it had been before regarded. Popular passions have been made subservient to intelligent consideration of the grounds of difficulties between governments. Peace on earth, good will to men, means more than it meant a year ago. God's hand may be seen changing what threatened to be a great calamity into a great blessing. For this we thank and praise him.

WHAT TO DO WITH THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

That question becomes pressing as the New Year draws nigh. Something better can be done and ought to be done with the Sunday schools than is being done. The essential thing is to do what is practicable, and not to spend time and strength in finding fault because the impracticable has not been attempted.

The best thing will be done in each school where the persons in charge study the conditions of that school and plan to develop its resources rather than to imitate what some other schools are doing. Uniformity in this business has been carried too far. No one form of organization, no single method of teaching, no one system of lessons is best for all schools and all classes. The new Manhattan Church of New York city proposes to organize its Sunday school according to the most advanced principles of pedagogy. It will have the president of the Teachers' College for its superintendent. It will have separate classrooms, examinations and promotions and its own courses of lessons. We note the plan proposed with much satisfaction. If it is carried out, as it may be, this new church will make a distinct and valuable contribution to the work of giving to the people knowledge of the Bible and of Christian life. But not every church—not many churches—can find presidents of colleges for their Sunday school superintendents, nor money for such equipment as this plan requires, nor pupils likely to stay in one Sunday school till they are promoted, step by step, from the kindergarten to the normal class. This plan, if carried out, may offer valuable suggestions to many schools. It can be followed by only a few. Its chief excellence is that it aims to bring those who unite in it to understand the materials they have in hand and to make the most of them in their own way.

Many schools which would fail utterly in attempts to carry out the plan we have described may make to the general work of the Sunday school no less distinct and valuable contributions by studying their limitations and opportunities and by developing among themselves, according to their own carefully chosen plans, the study of the Bible and the reproduction of the life of Christ. And this can be done in the small country school with few trained teachers or none at all, and in the city mission with its unstable and constantly changing membership, as well as in schools which represent mainly educated and permanently established families. What is needed is men and women interested to study their own schools so faithfully as to find out what can be done with them and then to do it. No object affords better opportunity for sociological study than the Sunday school.

The new knowledge of the Bible gained during this last quarter of a century calls for new methods of studying it. The new discoveries concerning the human mind and its processes of growth call for greater variety in ways of imparting truth and influencing motives. These will be discovered by experiments, which alone can test theories. Such experiments ought not to be undertaken without careful study of conditions. They ought not to be entered on merely because they have proved successful elsewhere. But superintendents and teachers ought not to be dissuaded from making experiments on the plea that they will thus show themselves disloyal to the idea of uniformity. Zeal and devotion in advancing Sunday school work, along paths already well worn, must be honored. The same kind of zeal and devotion in opening new paths for a new generation will not be unrewarded. What do you propose to do with your Sunday school in the year 1897?

REASONS FOR THANKSGIVING.

Sit down for an hour and think seriously what they are in your own case. It is surprising and not to our credit that we so often overlook many of them. The obligation of gratitude to God for general prosperity, health and comfort we do not quite forget, and we often thank him more or less earnestly for national mercies. But how careful are we to study in detail our personal reasons for thanking our Heavenly Father? How much trouble do we take to realize to ourselves what it would mean to us individually to have the prosperity of the church or the nation checked for a time?

We need to press closer and to go deeper in this matter. There is uncultivated soil in most of our hearts which is ready to bear rich and blessed fruit in thanksgiving if it be but turned up and sown. Moreover, our reasons for thankfulness are not wholly connected with the past. They also reach into the future. True gratitude to the divine Giver for his blessings not merely takes cognizance of the gifts and of what they have meant to us, but also begets cheerfulness, faith and energy with which to look forward and go on into the future.

Let it not be forgotten that there is ground for thanksgiving, too, in much of the adversity and sorrow which has befallen us. "It is good for me that I have been afflicted," said the Psalmist. "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now I observe thy word." So many a one of us has said. If God has entered the heart through the door of grief, and we have learned that his presence there means grace and strength and peace, we make the Psalmist's words our own in all sincerity.

Let the annual Thanksgiving season this year find us all more intelligently appreciative than ever of God's goodness, however manifested, and more sincerely and humbly thankful. Surely this is ample reason in every case.

CURRENT HISTORY.

John Eliot's Memory Honored.

The city of Newton, Mass., during the past week has suitably commemorated the 250th anniversary of the beginning of John Eliot's apostolic mission to the Indians at Nonantum. Adults and children united to celebrate the event and honor the patron saint of the city. Hon. William Everett's oration, given in the Eliot Church, Wednesday evening, was one of his best, and deserves preservation in permanent form. He said of Eliot:

> I regard Eliot as one of the most striking instances of the noblest type of the race. He was one of the few men who live in one age and are yet in advance of it. He was a man of his age. He took the profession then considered the most honorable, and performed his part with the purest sanctity and wisest charity. Yet he was not so entirely of the spirit of the age that he would not have been considered in any age a type of a liberal man. Had he never preached to the Indians he would have been honored by his contemporaries. Eliot was one of those amazing men who, having paid in full their debt to their own age, enter into work of which their age has no conception. He minded no obstacle. What heart conceived, mind planned and hand executed. His work stands to this day as an example to those who would take up the same work.

Today the nation is just beginning to learn some of the first principles of right dealing with the Indians, principles that Mr. Everett says Eliot discovered long ago. It is an interesting pursuit to contrast Eliot's humble efforts and limited financial resources with the fact that the estimates for the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, call for an appropriation by the nation of $7,290,000, which is more by $100,000 than was appropriated this year, the increase being due to the decision to abolish contract schools.

Christian Missions Assailed and Defended.

The way in which Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, metaphorically speaking, flays F. Hopkinson Smith in the New York Tribune of Nov. 12 is interesting to see, for there come times when righteous wrath justifies severe discipline, and this is the time of times. That Mr. Smith smarts under the lash is proved by his signed letter in the Sunday New York Herald, which certifies to his contumacy. If Mr. Smith has any friends left we advise them to use compulsion, if need be, in restricting his efforts hereafter to telling stories—in the form of novels—and to painting pictures, for his reputation as a student of life and a man of feeling and sympathy for his fellowmen has gone. This is not an opportune time to hurl stones at Christian missionaries. The testimony is all running the other way. Thus Mr. Edward Wistar, who went with the Red Cross expedition to the interior of Armenia and met forty of the missionaries of the American Board there, says of them: "They are very tactful, systematic and efficient in their signally varied tasks, and as adherents to apprehended duty they stand as examples in courage and fidelity worthy to be known and upheld. . . . Having already written and said elsewhere that the American missionaries in Central Turkey are teachers of the gospel of peace and of submission to the powers that be, I wish now to state in controversion of statements recently made to the contrary that they are not inciters of revolution or disquiet amongst the Armenians." Who knows most about the situation, Mr. Wistar who, at the risk of his life, penetrated to points in the interior where white men other than missionaries have not gone in forty years, or Mr. Smith, accepting favors from the sultan and never leaving Constantinople?

Turning to Japan, what do we find? The Japan Mail, which is far from evangelical, in a recent issue rebuked a Japanese journal for its misrepresentation of Christian missionaries, and closed its trenchant editorial thus:

> When so many men in the foreign settlements vilipend the missionaries and speak of them as a species of hypocritical parasite, they forget, if, indeed, they ever knew, that among these much-abused folk are highly educated gentlemen and ladies living lives of unceasing labor and self-denial, lives as noble as are to be found in any page of history, and setting unobtrusive examples of heroism that should make their traducers tingle with shame.

Arbitration of the Venezuelan Dispute.

It is asserted semi-officially that already Secretary Olney and Sir Julian Pauncefote have signed the protocol of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, which will commit Venezuela as well as the signatory Powers to a settlement by arbitration of the dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela over the boundary between the latter nation and British Guiana. Probably not until the annual message of President Cleveland is published shall we know the exact details of this great outcome of our recent assertion of the vitality of the Monroe Doctrine, but enough has been acknowledged both at London and Washington to justify the firm belief that a way out has been found honorable alike to all concerned. Our firm and dignified intervention in behalf of a weaker republic is now met by Lord Salisbury in quite a different spirit from that which he displayed last December. Our hegemony on this continent is recognized. Venezuela's aforetime willingness to arbitrate of course prevents her from refusing to do so now, the more especially since Great Britain's concessions put the whole disputed territory practically within the scope of the arbitrators' decree. Lastly, Great Britain has won protection for her bona fide settlers possessing a title sufficiently old (fifty years), and yet has left it to the tribunal to deal justly with such as are found to be resident on territory to which she has no just claim. All the details of this treaty will have much significance, but the details will pale into insignificance beside the great import of the principle recognized, which principle we dwell upon elsewhere. Moreover, statesmen at home and abroad recognize that the nation and the world enter upon a new era when so great a Power as Great Britain recognizes that we are justified when we stand guardian over this continent and make other American republics' just claims our own when European Powers refuse to do justice. That Great Britain has admitted it does not imply that Europe will, as may be inferred from the amazed and hostile comments of the continental press. The assertion by us of such a right—if it has been asserted—implies an equally great and momentous duty, and it behooves us as a people to decide deliberately whether if we assert the right we will perform the duty, be it ever so contrary to national traditions or costly in treasure and blood. The logic of events is sweeping us out into a larger sea of action than we ever sailed on before, and at a time, too, when internal problems are many and grave.

Spain and the United States.

General Weyler is now on the field in person leading what is conceded to be Spain's final attempt to crush the revolution in Cuba. As we go to press rumors of a prolonged and bloody struggle between him and Maceo come to us, and when the result is known the Administration in Washington will be better fitted to act, if action seems imperative. From out of the mass of sensational news sent forth from Washington last week we venture to glean with confidence this fact, that, while preserving strict neutrality and giving Spain no just cause for complaint against us, our responsible officials have also seen to it that our navy, our coast defenses and our army have been put in such a condition as best to fit them for prompt service should Spain seek and make an occasion for war, for few dispute that she prefers losing Cuba in a war with us, rather than by defeat at the hands of revolutionists.

French and German Internal Affairs.

The decisive defeat of the Radicals in the French House of Deputies last week, the Meline ministry receiving large majorities on three test votes, has had a wholesome effect, cripples for a time at least the fomenters of instability and disorder, and strengthens a ministry not credited with having over-much popular good will. Strange to say the debate raged over liberties of speech granted to clerics sitting in conference on social problems, and their right so to do was reaffirmed.

The sitting of the German Reichstag, just opened, bids fair to be stormy. Interpellations respecting Bismarck's betrayal of state secrets have been proffered and answered, though in a noncommittal way. The severity of recent laws suppressing freedom of speech and publication is to be denounced, and their repeal or amelioration fought for.

The "Great Assassin" Does Not Move.

The best news, and in fact the only reliable news, from Turkey that we have had during the past week was brought to New York by a British vessel carrying Armenian refugees from Smyrna. In order to escape with her precious human freight and save the Armenians from the Turks the vessel had to violate law and clear without her papers, but she did so with the approval of the United States consul and Admiral Selfridge of the Minneapolis, who it is said stood ready to act summarily had the British vessel been hindered. All honor to Captain Fisbee of the steamship Boyne, and its owners.

Reports from Constantinople are contradictory. Some tell of diplomats' families fleeing for fear, and others of diplomats leaving because diplomacy is at a standstill and the sultan is master. Few in European capitals put any faith in the reforms just ordered. Russia has just permitted a scaling down of the monetary obligations due her from Turkey, and of course done it with a truly philanthropic, disinterested motive. Alexandria in Egypt, Bulgaria, Greece, Marseilles in France and Boston and New York in this country each have their quota of recently landed, able-bodied, intelligent, often highly educated Armenians, driven forth from Turkey by the sword. Some day when she needs them most Turkey will rue their loss.

In the absence of more explicit information we suppose our Government's relations with Turkey continue "cordial," as Mr. Terrell would say. Nevertheless, it is galling to find The British Weekly saying that Mr. Terrell's language "shows the United States to be as indifferent as Germany. . . . Surely the representative of the great country across the Atlantic might have refrained from using a word which implies callousness to the sufferings of an Eastern Christian race." 'Tis true. He might have. He might have done much that he has not done, and left undone much that he has. The British Weekly is quite right in supposing that Mr. Terrell does not represent us. He misrepresents us, grievously too, and Mr. Cleveland showed no trace of good judgment or courage when he permitted him to return to Constantinople.

NOTES.

Ireland as well as India faces distress and famine. Grain riots have broken out in India.

The cars on Buffalo's street railways are now moved by electricity generated by Niagara Falls, twenty-six miles away.

Abyssinia and Italy have signed a treaty, by which the latter ceases to claim a protectorate over Erythrea, and recognizes the independence of Abyssinia.

Mr. Sovereign, head of the Knights of Labor, urges its members to continue to follow the free coinage of silver guerdon, and to array themselves against capitalists.

It would seem now as if South Dakota and Wyoming should be added to the roll of States voting for Mr. Bryan, and he probably will get one out of twelve electors from Kentucky. This reduces Mr. McKinley's total vote in the electoral college to 266.

Costa Rica and Columbia have agreed to submit a boundary dispute to the arbitration of the president of France. The international arbitration tribunal adjudicating on the disputed points of the decision of the Paris tribunal respecting Bering Sea matters is now in session at Victoria, B. C. Peace hath her victories these days.

New York city's new member of the municipal Civil Service Commission is a grandson of John Jay, a graduate of Columbia College and has the degree of Ph. D. from Munich; a new day has dawned. Dr. Parkhurst and the City Vigilance League announce that they are out on the trail again, and the bequest of $250,000 to the Society for the Prevention of Crime will give it a great impetus.

Representatives of most of Boston's temperance organizations met last week and began to plan for joint action in the approaching municipal campaign. There is a general feeling that the issue is to take on new forms, and that the suburban wards are to settle once for all their future method of dealing with the saloon. Co-operation at the State House, too, is necessary, and should go hand in hand with work among the voters of the city.

Mr. Bryan opened the campaign of 1900 with three speeches in Lincoln last Saturday. No fault can be found with their temper. "If experience teaches us that our opponents are right, we shall be able to enjoy and acquiesce in their victory and its fruits. If, on the contrary, they fail, and we are left to prove them in the wrong, we shall at last convince them that our principle was the right one."

IN BRIEF.

We shall publish next week a timely article by Dr. Washington Gladden entitled After the Election.

An ambulance last week had to carry away to a hospital a man injured in the initiation proceedings of a Brooklyn secret society.

How many men have been tempted by our pension system and fallen. The latest victim is a bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, sentenced to the penitentiary by a Federal judge and jury last week for making false pension affidavits.

The Examiner, Baptist, in its announcement of attractions for the next year, promises six articles by six different writers on the Achievements of Christianity. Four of the six writers are Congregationalists. This generous recognition of the abilities of leaders in a sister denomination is heartily appreciated.

In the history of the great political contest of 1896 it will gratify Christians of future generations to read that two of the candidates for the presidency were members of the Methodist, one of the Presbyterian and one of a Baptist church; and that they all, under the keenest popular scrutiny, in their personal character and conduct did no discredit to the Christian Church.

It is not safe to assume that because a man is a Scotchman therefore he is a Protestant. A Presbyterian clergyman in New York city was recently asked to address the Scottish Celtic Society of that city. Forthwith he proceeded to give a eulogy of William of Orange. The chagrin of the Roman Catholic descendants of the adherents of the Stuarts may be imagined.

"Black Prince" Stillman, the notorious Negro gambler of the Pacific coast, was recently asked what he thought of gambling as a career. He replied: "Nine out of ten of the gambling men I have known have died poor. But the fascination of the game is irresistible, and not five persons in a hundred can leave a career of gambling behind and go into another pursuit if they have any money left."

Boston rejoices that the long anticipated visit of Ian Maclaren is at hand. He will spend most of next week in this vicinity. His appointments for lectures and readings at Tremont Temple are four, two of them being scheduled for the afternoon and evening of Tuesday, the 24th, and two for the following Saturday. On Sunday morning, Nov. 29, he will preach for Dr. Gordon at the Old South.

Next Sunday has been designated by the Methodist Episcopal General Conference and by many other religious bodies in this country and in England as Temperance Sunday. Besides the abiding reasons which make temperance a pertinent theme, there are in many localities special grounds at this time for wise and ringing words, showing men the dangers of intemperance and calling them to their duties to suppress it.

President Cyrus Northrop of Minnesota University lately made an address in the open air on the occasion of the opening of a new cemetery. The day was cold and raw. He apologized for keeping his hat on because, he said, he "did not feel like contributing himself personally to the success of the enterprise." Ministers officiating at funerals in cemeteries would do well to paste this in their hats as a reminder.

"Painting the town red" because of a national political victory seems to have given place in most places this year to strong but self-contained expressions of joy. It is gratifying that the Doxology was sung at the house of Major McKinley on receipt of the news of his election, that it is the climax of political editorials and is sung at jollification meetings. Some one has said that the good bishop who wrote it never Ken-ned that his Doxology would be put to such a use.

An Evangelical Conference is to be held in the city of Mexico, Jan. 27-29. It is proposed to devote one of these three days to Sunday school work. Delegates from the United States will be welcomed, and travelers who intend to visit Mexico this season and who are interested in this work will do good and get good by making this meeting one of the objects of their visit. Any such may get further information by addressing M. D. Byers, Secretary, Atwood Building, Chicago, Ill.

The Unitarians of England have recently taken action which practically permits non-Christian theists to be settled over their churches with the sanction of their denominational examining body, the advisory council. That is, they have decided to drift along in this way until the next meeting of their national conference, to be held April, 1897. And yet they wonder why the Free Church Congress leaders refuse to co-operate with Unitarians in their joint effort to extend the influence of Christianity over Great Britain and its dependencies.

Boston's largest theater has been crowded during the past week with men and boys intent on seeing and hearing a French woman,

"the subject matter of whose songs is avowedly immoral and whose manner of singing them increases this a hundred-fold." We quote from the Transcript, which "left others to condemn, desiring simply to record" its impression. Why leave it to others? What is the function of a dramatic critic of a high-toned paper if it is not to condemn vice?

It is claimed that the value of iron, by various refining processes which transform the ore into watchsprings, is increased from one-seventh of a cent to $5,000 per pound. The increase in value of masses of "black humanity" which comes by education may be suggested by the exquisitely refined music of the Fisk Jubilee Singers, who added so much to the interest of the A. M. A. jubilee. Three of them are now pursuing post-graduate studies at Harvard, another at Yale, while two more are in the ministry.

In addition to the letter in another column from the Business Men's Non-Partisan Sound Money League, we have received these kind words from a business man widely known and influential: "I am grateful to The Congregationalist for its patriotism in doing what it has done so splendidly. When others hesitated and balanced articles against articles, your paper took the high ground at the start and has helped largely to make public sentiment. The important thing is for some one to see clearly at the beginning, and then have courage to speak out as your paper did."

The best story yet recorded of the new Archbishop of Canterbury is that of his daring to decline an invitation to call on the Emperor of Germany when the latter was in London recently. "My lord, neither I nor anybody else ever conveyed such an answer to the Emperor of Germany," said the messenger. "I cannot help it," said Bishop Temple, "you must carry it now." Would that there were more men who could discipline the youthful ruler thus. He and his nation are suffering grievously today because of his conceit and arrogance. His speech to the new army recruits last week was a combination of cant and bathos.

The paragraph in a recent issue about vulgar expressions on buttons understates the case. Some of them are obscene in the extreme. The agent of the Watch and Ward Society succeeded in landing a vender of these goods in the police court the other day, and the judge promptly imposed a fine of $100 and costs. This same society has been represented at the larger cattle fairs this autumn, and has secured the arrest of several exhibitors of the phonograph and kinetoscope who were catering to a depraved taste by means of obscene productions and reproductions. The devil seems to be keeping pace with modern science in his efforts to debauch humanity.

Miss Frances Willard's intimate knowledge of the real plight of Armenians in Turkey and Armenians en route to lands of liberty make her words unusually impressive when she says:

Who knows but it may be the King's highway for this tortured people, who in a materialistic age have given the world a proof that the devotion of the early church still flames brightly at the ancient hearthstone? I think this demonstration of devotion to Christ and the gospel is the most hopeful and luminous fact that relieves the somber shadows of this fin de siècle period, in which the decadent declares that every man walketh in a vain show. Who can doubt but that Christianity has received from the ineffable example of the Armenian martyrs an impetus well-nigh unequaled, and never so sorely needed as in our day?

Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost, now a lawyer in New York city, but formerly a Radical clergyman, in defending a client—an ex-clergyman—charged with larceny recently offered the following plea: "It is impossible for any one who has not been closed up in a study for fifteen years to realize the exact condition of the clerical mind. Absorbed in abstruse theological questions, the clergyman soon loses sight of the practical affairs of the world. He becomes childlike in his simplicity and inexperience, and is absolutely ignorant of the ways of the world." There are some men in these latter days who seem bound to try to make the world believe that all clergymen are either knaves or fools, and Mr. Pentecost, reasoning from his own experience, seems to fancy the latter hypothesis.

Miss M. C. Collins, who has been for twenty years a medical missionary among the Sioux Indians, has greatly interested the audiences in Boston and vicinity, to whom she has lately been speaking. She has rare practical good sense, a keen appreciation of humor and a loyalty to her people as great as though she were of their blood. She told a good story of their idea of the value of Congregationalism. She has for some years conducted very successfully a Fourth of July celebration in which the members of the Congregational church have taken a prominent part. Last summer they carried out the whole celebration without assistance from her or any other white person. Some of the other Indians asked them how they managed so well. They answered, "O, we're Congregationalists, and so we have to govern ourselves."

Unless we greatly misinterpret a communication published in the Catholic Mirror, written by Rev. Silliman Blagden and addressed to Cardinal Gibbons, it sets forth the familiar Jesuitical argument that the end justifies the means. Mr. Blagden seems to hold that Cardinal Manning is not to be held responsible for any duplicities of conduct revealed in his personal dealings with other Roman Catholic prelates, because, forsooth, he "was fearlessly, boldly and courageously seeking to serve his God and promote the interests and welfare of his church, oblivious of all else and regardless of men!" (The italics are Mr. Blagden's.) Cardinal Gibbons's reply to this communication is interesting, for in it he says: "Much as I admired the cardinal during life, I revered him still more after reading this life, and love him for the calumnies which little men have uttered against him." In reply to this it may be said that men, both ordinary and great, have simply taken Cardinal Manning's own letters and convicted him of duplicity.

Doubtless in the old days Harvard, Yale and the other older of our institutions of learning had too many clergymen on their governing bodies, and the inevitable reaction came with the swing of the pendulum too far to the other extreme. President Eliot of Harvard confessed this last week in an address before the Twentieth Century Club, Boston. Harvard today has only one clergyman on the board of overseers and none in the corporation. "I believe we can ill afford to spare the spiritual and intellectual force and power," says President Eliot, "of men like Edward Everett Hale, Phillips Brooks and other men of that stamp." No institution can retain its grip on the humanities and idealities of life which persists in excluding from its governing body those who serve as pastors of afflicted and aspiring humanity and interpret God to men. President Eliot in the same speech also confessed that Harvard's falling for a time into the hands of Unitarians was by no means an unmixed blessing, and there is no surer sign of the general recognition of the fact than the present assiduous efforts of President Eliot to give Presbyterians, Baptists, Orthodox Congregationalists, Episcopalians and Roman Catholics an opportunity to mold the religious thought of the men of the university.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

The Storrs Jubilee.

The air of all our Congregational circles is full of this, in anticipation of next week's commemorative services. These will not be perfunctory, but the hearts of our people, and not merely of those who take public part, will be in them. It is delightful to see and hear the unanimity of sentiment expressed by all other families of Christians here, blending with our own their praises of the man, of his character, and of the life work by which he has already left imperishable impressions of good on these cities that will make his name reverently honored and his memory fragrant over our land and in other lands, indeed, but specially in these two cities as long as their walls shall stand. Wherever the sons of the Pilgrims have carried their doctrines and polity, this profound scholar, brilliant preacher and unsurpassed orator is known and held as among the highest of our great men. The whole Congregational communion is proud of him, but here, where he is best known, with all this is blended genuine and well-earned personal affection. No one presumes to enter into rivalry with him, and even the envious envy not him. He has borne his honors so meekly, has been always so considerate of his brethren and so variously helpful to them that he has escaped the common lot of men in high position and has made his way to the warmest spot in many a grateful heart. No man was ever more ready with helpful advice or awakening suggestion to a brother seeking it, and not a few pastors and preachers will thankfully own that much of the best work of their lives was the fruit of illumination and quickening received from his inspiring stimulation.

The Moody and Sankey Meetings.

These began on Monday with large audiences, and have daily increased until the great hall of the Cooper Union is crowded to its fullest capacity morning and afternoon with active members from all our evangelical churches. It is an inspiring sight to see, from the Bible House windows, the vast throngs pour from the hall at the close of each service — mature men and women, intelligent and thoughtful in manner and bearing, their faces showing the deepest interest in the themes discussed and the speakers. Mr. Moody has addressed himself almost exclusively in this series to church members, thinking that he can best reach the unconverted masses here not by fervid appeals, to cease at his departure a few days hence, but by arousing the spiritual life of the churches and stirring them to earnest, permanent work for the unsaved souls ever around them. Drs. John Hall, D. J. Burrell, A. C. Dixon and a well-selected committee of earnest ministers are assisting Mr. Moody, who preaches also at Carnegie Hall on Sunday afternoons, admission being by tickets to secure an entrance. Mr. Sankey sings at all the meetings with his usual effectiveness. All God's people here are expecting good results from these meetings.

Christian Association Services.

This week is observed as a Week of Prayer by the Y. M. C. A. in their hall in Twenty-third Street. Rev. C. I. Scofield, formerly home missionary superintendent for Texas and now pastor of the church in Northfield, Mass., is giving a series of five practical lectures on How to Study the Bible. Here, also, the congregations are as large as can be accommodated, and the interest is great.

The Good Brooklyn Women.

As many of these as compose the New York and Brooklyn district branch of the State Home Missionary Union—Mrs. Dr. Kincaid, president—began the observance of their annual meeting on Thursday in the Clinton Avenue Church. Mrs. Dr. Meredith led the devotions and Mrs. Dr. McLeod gave an address of welcome. Reports were heard from delegates representing twenty-one of the forty-eight auxiliaries in the State. The treasurer, Mrs. Pearsall, reported $6,117 raised by the ladies of this district ($1,500 more than last year), and $13,157 raised by the State Union. Miss M. D. Moffatt narrated her experience among the roughs of Oklahoma and Miss Mary C. Collins told of her work among the Indians.

Personal.

Friends of Dr. E. P. Terhune, lately pastor of the Puritan Church, Brooklyn, who were made anxious by reports of his seriously dangerous condition here in the Presbyterian Hospital, will be glad to be relieved of undue fears as to his recovery. An operation for abscess has been successfully performed by Dr. McBurney; the patient is greatly relieved and there is good reason to hope that he will soon resume work.

The grief in a wide circle of ministers here over the sudden death of Dr. Quint proves that the knowledge and warm esteem of this excellent servant of our Lord and of his churches were not confined to the State or the section where he made his home. His usefulness to our churches could hardly be overestimated, and his personal merits made him dear to all here who came in contact with him.

Our Youngest Sister.

Our newest Congregational church, the Manhattan, latest born of the twelve now numbered within the enlarged city limits, was formally recognized and Dr. H. A. Stimson was installed as its pastor, Nov. 9. And now, the prayers of many for another of our churches in the city being answered, it remains to be seen whether the prediction that one such church well planted would speedily be followed by others shall be fulfilled. Surely there must be room for more than twelve Pilgrim churches in New York, since twenty live in Brooklyn with no crowding, and the people ask for more.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

After the Election.

It is difficult to realize that only a little more than a week ago this city was full of excitement and with rumors which disturbed nearly every one who had any interest in the honor and prosperity of the nation. Now everything is quiet. Money has begun to circulate freely. While there is no boom in business, men are encouraged. The stores are thronged as never before. Mills have started up and men who dreaded the approach of winter are now at work at wages which will provide for themselves and their families. Few, however, imagine that the battle for free silver is over. Most look for a temporary lull in hostilities, but see no immediate prospect of success in persuading the advocates of free silver to give up the fight, and settle down to the conviction that the standard which the commercial world agrees to adopt is the only standard which our country can adopt. Nothing has given Christian people in Chicago more gratification than the fact, known to a few of his friends and quietly reported in various circles, that when it became evident to Mr. McKinley that he had been elected President, he went to his room upstairs, where, with his wife and mother, he spent an hour in prayer. He has said, also, that, while he has heard from politicians and men of wealth, he wants to hear from the Christian people of the country and the ministers, for he wishes his administration to be an administration of righteousness, as well as of commercial prosperity.

Anarchistic Ravings.

Although these grow less every year, the anniversary of the execution of Parsons, Spies and their associates always brings together a motley crowd and furnishes an occasion for some very wild and unreasonable language. This year the anniversary exercises were in the Twelfth Street Turner Hall. Policemen in citizens' dress were plentifully scattered through the audience. While waiting for the arrival of Herr Most of New York, the audience called for Mrs. Lucy Parsons, long known as one of the most bitter and reckless of our anarchistic speakers. This year she was even more rabid than usual, so much so, indeed, that a policeman led her from the stage. Fortunately the arrival of Herr Most, and his advice to observe quiet, prevented any serious disturbance. But the fact that such gatherings as this are held, and that such violent onslaughts upon all authority are often made, and that thousands of unthinking people stand ready to applaud them renders it important that the hands of those intrusted with the enforcement of law be strengthened, and that the youth among us, especially those brought up in circles where the spirit of anarchy prevails, should be taught the real principles of law and order and the real purpose of government.

A Patriotic Sociable.

Friday evening, Nov. 6, was celebrated by the members of the First Church, Chicago, by a sociable which served as an outlet for the joy which is so universally felt in this city over the outcome of the election. For one of the remarkable facts of the situation is that among those who voted for Mr. Bryan not a few have been heard to express their complete satisfaction with the result. The Sunday school rooms and parlors of the great edifice at the corner of Ann Street and Washington Boulevard were adorned with flags and relics of battle fields made sacred during the last war. A letter from Judge Tourgee was read, in which he spoke of the respect and love shown for the flag by all classes of people as among the most touching and impressive incidents of the recent campaign. A story of the colors of the Forty-second Illinois was also told, to which Dr. Henson added an account of the ten battles through which they had been carried. Prof. S. I. Curtiss was master of ceremonies, which were under the patronage of the ladies of the congregation. Among those present none were more patriotic all through the Civil War, or more loyal to the good name of the Government during the last few months, than Dr. Goodwin, now the patriarch in ministerial service in our churches.

Professor Wright of Oberlin.

Sunday morning Dr. Wright spoke from the Union Park pulpit on the harmonies between science and revelation, and Monday morning addressed the ministers on the present state of opinion in regard to the antiquity of man. It was made clear that there need be no clashing between the opinions of scientists and believers in the Scriptures, that what is needed is a spirit of mutual conciliation, a recognition of the facts as science discovers them, and a better, because a truer, interpretation of the written Word of God. Not more than twelve or fifteen thousand years are required, according to Professor Wright, to account for all that man has done on the earth, and half that time may prove sufficient. A minute expressing appreciation of the work of the late Dr. A. H. Quint was adopted and a congratulatory letter, prepared by a special committee appointed the previous week, was sent to Dr. R. S. Storrs, to be read on the occasion of his approaching fiftieth anniversary. The ministers also recognized with gratitude the fact that our saloons can be closed by the authorities, for this was done election day, and the hope was expressed that the authorities would see their way clear to enforcing the law which requires that they be closed Sundays throughout the year.

A Glad Church Day.

Such was Nov. 8 for the California Avenue Church of this city, Dr. D. F. Fox, pastor. On that day the congregation subscribed $4,500 toward the debt still remaining on their house of worship. This brings the amount raised by this people during the panic years up to $30,000. During the four years and a half since Dr. Fox began work the membership has grown to more than 500. The Sunday school is even larger, the C. E. Society is one of the best in Chicago and the midweek prayer meeting is thronged, as are the services on Sunday both morning and evening. While there are no remarkably rich people in the church or society, there are many prosperous young business men who are ready to give according to their means, and a few persons who are able to contribute comparatively large sums. Thus Rev. and Mrs. W. E. Holyoke give $1,000 each and others $500 each. But the power of the church has been in the great number of persons who could only subscribe small amounts but were willing to do all that they could for their church home. This church has in all respects won for itself an honorable place in our list of churches, and must hereafter be reckoned among those of the first class.

Mrs. Moses Smith and Mt. Holyoke.

The friends of Mt. Holyoke in the West are anxious that her plan and that of Dr. D. K. Pearsons of appealing to the churches of New England for means with which to erect a building in memory of Mary Lyon should be adopted. They think that New England should cease for a week or a month from giving to Western colleges and concentrate her gifts on one of her home institutions. From this distance it seems as if the collections of a single Sunday would suffice, were the ministers heartily united in the object, to erect the building desired. It ought to be a building worthy the character and work of the person it would commemorate. If Mrs. Smith can have a hearing in circles where decisive action can be taken, we are sure she will convince those who listen to her that her proposal is both wise and feasible.

Chicago, Nov. 14. FRANKLIN.

FROM LONDON.

The Armenian Agitation.

The British people to a man have all along been filled with a smoldering fire of indignation and horror that needed only a touch to kindle into a blaze. That touch was supplied by Mr. Gladstone. Recognized leaders delayed, hesitated, were overcome by the difficulties of the situation and hoped that things would automatically improve. Mr. Gladstone never hesitated, never faltered. Since, over a year ago, he represented the sultan as waving his flag in triumph over the European nations prostrate at his feet, he has in message after message sounded one consistent note. He started the agitation and has been its inspiration throughout. It is an utter misconception of Mr. Gladstone's Liverpool speech to suppose that he advocated this, that and the other, but ruled out of court the independent action of Britain in any contingency. His language was guarded, he gave suggestive hints rather than made specific statements, but the whole pith and marrow and culminating idea of the speech was that Britain should, by adopting in turn the various courses he indicated, free and qualify herself to take whatever final action she might deem necessary. Mr. Gladstone did not say in so many words that in the last resort Britain should go to war single-handed, simply because his unique experience as a cabinet minister, and his special knowledge "of what materials the present sultan, with all his seeming obstinacy, is made," convince him that she would never be called on to do so; but he certainly did not, as has been erroneously supposed, bar out that dread alternative.

On the Armenian question Mr. Gladstone has interpreted the sentiment of the nation far more fully and truly than any other statesman. He is the idol of the people and now stands in their esteem on a higher pinnacle than ever before. At the demonstrations on behalf of Armenia that I have attended, including the two chief at the City Temple and St. James's Hall, his name has been received with an enthusiasm impossible to describe, people of all creeds and parties uniting in the acclaim. The remarkable feature of the St. James's Hall assembly in particular, which was in every sense national and representative, was its absolute unanimity as to Britain's stern duty. Any and every helpful suggestion was heartily applauded, but the proposition which above all others received unanimous and enthusiastic indorsement was that in the last resort Britain must be true to her best traditions, and, though all Europe be arrayed against her, make a brave effort to save the remnant of the Armenians, even if she perish in the attempt. That, unquestionably, literally represents the feeling of the bulk of the nation.

No sensible person believes in the probability of a coalition of all the European Powers against Britain—their mutual jealousies alone would prevent that—but given such a combination and given an opposing force on land or sea, or both, numerically superior to that of Britain, the average Englishman declines to fold his hands and confess impotence. He chafes under the suggestion that he must remain inactive. The spirit and policy that win his admiration and adhesion are the spirit and policy of Nelson at Trafalgar, and it is because faint-hearted folk like Lord Rosebery have been showing a craven spirit that Trafalgar day this year has been celebrated on a scale and with a zest that has not been known for many years. But England cannot live on past achievements. That the old spirit does animate British hearts was beautifully and pathetically illustrated by the calm declaration (followed by thunders of applause) of the saintly white haired Bishop of Hereford at the St. James's Hall meeting that he would send his soldier son, his youngest living child, the dearly loved son of his mother while she was on earth, to any risk that might be necessary on behalf of Armenia, and that the same sacrifice would be freely and unflinchingly made, though it might be with bleeding hearts, in a hundred thousand British homes. The universal feeling is that England's good name was never in greater jeopardy than now. The nation's honor is in the keeping of Lord Salisbury: woe betide him and us if he betray the trust! Meantime the agitation continues. Those who were most active in promoting it thought it would reach a natural termination with the St. James's Hall meeting, but that suggestion was then and there repudiated. No living person can recall a time when the nation was so deeply moved as now, the present agitation far exceeding that aroused twenty years ago by the Bulgarian atrocities.

Lord Rosebery's Position.

The Liberal party, especially the Nonconformist section, which has been described as its backbone, feels poignantly the need of a leader. In several quarters the suggestion has been seriously made that Mr. Gladstone should be asked again to take his place at the head of the party, one member of Parliament going so far as to call a meeting of his constituents, and offering to resign in order that the Grand Old Man might be elected. In the present crisis Mr. Gladstone has been the actual leader, and of course he can assume the moral leadership of the party, or, indeed, of the nation, whenever he chooses to do so. But alas! we cannot put back the hand of time. Sir William Harcourt is a brilliant swordsman; he excites the admiration of many and wins the devotion of some, but he does not inspire general enthusiasm. So long as he chooses to devote to politics whatever time he can spare from the turf, Lord Rosebery will always be a force to be reckoned with; it is even conceivable that in the whirligig of political life he may again be premier; but the leader of a united Liberal party, that includes the bulk of Nonconformists, he can never be. He has always been more or less of an enigma; we felt we did not really know the heart of the man; we wondered what lay behind that impassive, sphinx-like face; we hoped it screened from view great reserves of power and noble quality, and we tried to regard his fondness for the turf as a weakness that time would cure. Now he stands self-revealed—the advocate of a selfish, materialistic, take care of ourselves and devil take the rest of mankind policy, without one high note in it. We will not again have this man over us, say Nonconformists with practically united voice; we will not again encroach upon the time he would probably prefer to spend upon the race course. His lordship has entered no fewer than eighty-one horses for next season's races—that will be quite enough for him to attend to.

Dr. Dunning's Suggestion.

As the cry of agonized Armenia reaches this country, many here cast their eyes across the Atlantic and sigh for an alliance between England and America that would render it impossible for a callous European concert again to look on quietly whilst fellow-creatures are butchered by the thousand. The consummation of such an understanding would be hailed with unbounded joy by the whole British people, and, happily, several indications look in that direction. To refer to one only, it is noted with much satisfaction on this side that the Outlook has taken up and cordially indorsed Dr. Dunning's plea for a closer union of American and British Congregationalists. The proposal is the subject of conversation among ministers and laymen, the general feeling being that the idea should be allowed to germinate so that in due time a definite plan may be formulated. A high official at the Memorial Hall considers that, whilst organic union of the two representative bodies might not be practicable, some kind of federation is eminently desirable and would have great practical value. A joint pronouncement of the two organizations on such a question as that of Armenia, for instance, would carry immense weight. The Manchester Guardian, the most influential of our provincial weeklies, suggests that the idea need not be confined to any one denomination, but might with advantage be extended to all the Free Churches. In our National Council of Evangelical Free Churches we have an organization admirably adapted to the furtherance of such an aim.

Ties that Bind.

The fraternal feeling of the two peoples is greatly strengthened by the increasing interchange of visits between eminent representatives of both countries. This year we have sent you of our very best, and we have had the privilege of welcoming American friends new and old. Dr. Amory Bradford's holiday ministry was so much appreciated that he was prevailed upon to prolong his stay at Kensington Chapel, whose gifted young minister, Mr. Silvester Horne, makes slow progress towards recovering the health he lost by overwork. Dr. Lorimer received a royal welcome at Marylebone Presbyterian Church, his series of special sermons attracting multitudes of young people. Dr. Reuen Thomas's congregations at the City Temple equaled those regularly drawn by Dr. Parker, whom, some daring person suggested, he might possibly some day succeed. Dr. John Hall favored the provinces with his presence, but, as is his wont, kept out of London as much as possible. Dr. Parkhurst, than whom no American would be more heartily welcomed by Londoners, tantalizes us every year by slipping through to Switzerland so quietly that until he has gone scarce anybody knows he has been among us. Dr. G. A. Gordon's three-weeks' residence at Mansfield College afforded students a desired opportunity of making personal acquaintance with the author of The Christ of Today. Dr. Noble enlarged the circle of his friends by preaching in several London pulpits and charming all who came into personal contact with him. Later visitors included Dr. Barrows, en route for India, who preached for Dr. Pentecost, and lectured at Browning Hall on the Universal Fatherhood of God, and Dr. F. E. Clark, who, in pursuance of his Christian Endeavor campaign, paid a flying visit to England, Scotland and Ireland, receiving in each country enthusiastic welcome from thousands of young Endeavorers Appreciation of American preachers and speakers steadily increases in this country, and the supply is not equal to the demand. Intending visitors should advise in advance the London correspondent of The Congregationalist of their coming, and on arrival register their names and addresses at the Memorial Hall.

Prof. Henry Drummond's Illness.

His many American friends will regret to hear that the brilliant author of the Ascent of Man is still lying prostrate in the South of England, wholly confined to bed and unable to write. Happily, medical men begin to think there are signs of improvement, and they are very hopeful. But meantime a substitute has had to be found to take his work for next year. Professor Drummond bears his long and trying illness with characteristic fortitude and cheerfulness.

The Sign of the Cross.

Mr. Wilson Barrett's remarkable play continues to attract large crowds in London and the provinces and to be the theme of pulpit discourses. Clerical opinion in regard to it is certainly not unanimous, but unquestionably the commendation exceeds the condemnation. The Sign of the Cross is now being played in six towns before an aggregate assembly of about 12 000 nightly and 100,000 weekly. The piece has been presented about 900 times, and it is estimated that it has been witnessed in England and America by at least 2,000,000 people. ALBION.

The Courting Stick.

A Thanksgiving Story, by Hezekiah Butterworth.

"Kalub, Kalub Short, do stop shellin' corn, just for a little, and let me talk with you."

The falling of kernels of corn into a large basket ceased, and Caleb Short looked towards his wife, who was sitting by a stand on which was a candle, at one side of the fireplace.

"Well, what now, Asenath?"

Caleb sat with a half shelled ear of corn in one hand and a cob in the other. Caleb was a farmer. His farm lay near the Ox-bow in the intervales of Hadley. It was on the Bay Path, the historic road that ran from the wide green meadows that make the principal street of old Hadley, to Boston town.

"Kalub," said Mrs. Short, lowering her head, and turning it aside, "I've been your yokefellow now goin' on thirty year, and I have got all my faculties left yet. Now I want to tell you what I think is goin' to happen. I can see it by my spiritual eyes."

"Well, what is it that is goin' to happen, Asenath?"

"Myron Smith is goin' to cast sheep's eyes on our Amandy! There!"

Caleb dropped the ear of corn and the cob.

"Show, now. Well, I always hoped that that would come to pass, seein' the Smith farm jines our'n."

"Kalub, now look here; we've got near upon everything so far as this world's goods go—spinnin' wheels and hatchels, and looms and a mahogany table, and even a board to be used to lay us out on when the final time shall come. The last thing that you bought was a dinner horn, and then I put away the conch shell from the Indies along with the cradle and the baby chair. But, Kalub, there's one thing more that we will have to have. The families down at Longmeadow have all got them; they save fire and fuel, and they enable the young folks and their elders all to talk together at the same time, respectfully in the same room, and when the young folks have a word to say to each other in private it encourages them. Now I'm kind o' sociable like myself, and I like to encourage young people; that's why I wanted you to buy a spinet for Mandy. I don't like to see young folks go apart by themselves, especially in winter; there is no need of extra lights or fires, if one only has one of them things."

"One of them things? Massy sakes alive, what is it, Asenath?"

"Why, havn't you never seen one, Kalub? It is a courtin' stick. They didn't used to have such things when we were young. A courtin' stick is like Aaron's rod that budded."

"A courtin' stick! Conquiddles! Do I hear my ears? There don't need to be any machinery for courtin' in this world no more than there does to make the avens bloom, or the corn cockles to come up in the corn. What is a courtin' stick, Asenath?"

"Well, Kalub, a courtin' stick is a long, hollow wooden tube, with a funnel at each end—one funnel to cover the mouth of the one that speaks, and one to cover the ear of the one that listens. By that stick—it is all so proper and handy when it works well and steady—young people can talk in the same room, and not disturb the old people or set the work folks and the boys to titterin' as they used to do when we were young. It was discovered here in the Connecticut Valley, which has always been a place of providences. Just as I said, it is a savin' of fire and lights in the winter time, and it suggests the right relations among families of property. It is a sort of guide-post to life. The elder," she added, "approves of courtin' sticks, when the family offer them to their acceptable visitors, and I do."

Mrs. Short straightened up at the pronoun "I," giving a bob to her high cap border. She folded her hands on her lap and looked directly at Caleb.

The latter picked up an ear of corn and drummed on one side of the basket.

"Well, Asenath, may be you do, but I do not know whether I do or not."

"Kalub, don't you want that I should show you one?"

"Where did you get it, Asenath?"

"Asahel made it for me. I told him how to make it, but when I came to explain to him what it was for his face fell, and he turned red and he said, 'hyppogriffo.' I wonder where he got that word—'hyppogriffo!' It has a pagan sound; Asahel, he mistrusted."

"Mistrusted what, Asenath?"

"Well, I haven't told you quite all. When the head of a family knows that a certain young man is comin' to visit him at a certain time and hangs up a courtin' stick over the mantel-tree shelf, or the dresser, it is a sign to the visitor he is welcome."

"But there is no need of a sign like that, Asenath."

Asenath rose, went into the spare bedroom, a place of the mahogany bureau, the mourning piece, valences and esconces, and brought out a remarkable looking tube, which seemed to have leather ears at each end, and which was some dozen feet long.

"Moses!" said Caleb, "and all the patriarchs!" he added. "Let's you and me try it. There, you put it up to your ear and let me speak. Is the result satisfyin'?"

Asenath assured him that the experiment was quite satisfactory.

"Well, well," said Caleb. "Now I will go on shellin' corn and think matters over; it may be all right if the elder says it is."

For a few minutes there was a rain of corn into the basket, when Caleb started up and said, "Cracky!" He put his hand into one pocket after another, then went up to the peg board and took down his fur overcoat and felt of the pockets in it. He came back to the place of the corn shelling doubtfully, and began to trot, as it were, around the basket, still putting his hand into one pocket after another.

"Lost anything, Kalub?" asked Asenath.

"Yes, the stage driver gave me a parcel directed to Asahel, in the care of Amanda, and I don't know what I did with it. I meant to have told you about it, but you set me all into confusion over that there courtin' stick."

We know not how many old New England homesteads may have a courting stick among their heirlooms, but imagine that they are few. Such a stick used to be shown to the curious in the Longmeadow neighborhood of Springfield, Mass., and we think it may be seen there still. It was especially associated with the manners and customs of the Connecticut Valley towns, and it left behind it some pleasing legends in such pastoral villages as Northampton, Hadley and Hatfield. It was a promising object lesson in the domestic life of the worldly wise, and could have been hardly unwelcome to marmlet maidens and rustic beaux.

Caleb Short continued his shelling corn for a time, but he worked slowly. He at last turned around and looked at his wife, who was sewing rags for a to-be-braided mat.

"Well, what is it now, Kalub?" asked the latter.

"Asahel."

"Yes—I know—I've been thinkin' much about him of late. He came to us as a bound boy after his folks were dead, and we've done well by him, now haven't we, Kalub? I've set store by him, but—I might as well speak it out, he's too sociable with our Mandy now that they have grown up. It stands to reason that he can never marry Mandy."

"Why not, Asenath?"

"Why not? How would you like to have people say that our Amanda had married her father's hired man? How would it look on our family tree?" Asenath glanced up to a fruitful picture on the wall.

"Asahel is a true-hearted boy," said Caleb. "Since our own son has taken to evil ways, who will we have to depend upon in our old age but Asahel, unless Mandy should marry?"

"O Kalub, think what a wife I've been to you and listen to me. Mandy is going to marry. I am going to invite Myron Smith here on Thanksgiving, and to hang up the courtin' stick over the dresser, so that he will see it plain. That stick is goin' to jine the two farms. It is a yard stick—there, now, there! I always was great on calculation; Abraham was, and so was Jacob; it's Scriptural. You would have never proposed to me if I hadn't encouraged you, and only think what a wife I've been to you! Just like two wives."

"But Asahel Bow is a thrifty boy. He is sensible and savin', and he is feelin'."

"Kalub, Kalub Short, now that will do. Who was his father? Who but old Seth Bow? Everybody knows what he was, and blood will tell. Just think of what that man did!"

"What, Asenath?"

"Why, you know that he undertook to preach, and he thought that if he opened his mouth the Lord would fill it. And he opened his mouth, and stood with it open for nearly ten minutes, and he couldn't speak a word. He was a laughingstock, and he never went to meetin' much after that, only to evenin' meetin's in the schoolhouse—candle light meetin's."

"Yes, Asenath, that is all true. But Seth Bow was an honest man. Just hear how he used to talk to me. He used to say to me—I often think of it—he used to say: 'Caleb Short, I've lost my standin' among the people, but I haven't lost my faith in God, and there is a law that makes up for things. I couldn't preach, but Asahel is goin' to preach. He's inherited the germ of intention from me, and one day that will be something to be thankful for, come Thanksgiving Days. I will preach through Asahel yet. I tell you, Caleb, there is a law that makes up for things. No good intention was ever lost. One must do right, and then believe that all that happens to him is for his good. That is the way the book of Job reads, and I have faith, faith, faith! You may all laugh at me, but Asahel will one day be glad that his old father wanted to preach, and tried, even if he did fail. The right intention of the father is fulfilled in the son, and I tell you there's a law that makes up for things, and so I can sing Thanksgiving Psalms with the rest of um, if I don't dare to open my mouth in doin' it.' Asenath, I look upon Asahel as a boy that is blessed in the intention of his father. The right intentions of a boy live in the man, and the gov'nin' purpose of the man lives in his boys or those whom he influences, and I tell you, Asenath, there's nothing better to be considered on Thanksgiving Days than the good intentions of the folks of the past that live in us. There are no harvests in the world ekul to those. You wait and see."

The weather door slowly opened, and the tall form of a young man appeared.

"Asahel," said Asenath, "we were just speakin' of you and your folks, and now I want to have a talk with you. Take off your frock, and don't be standing there like a swamp crane, but sit down on the unipod here close by me, as you used to do when you was a small boy. I set store by you, and you just think what a mother I've been to you since your own mother was laid away in the juniper let! But I am a proper plain speakin' woman, as your own mother was—she that answered the minister back in meetin' time when the good old elder said that your father was a hypocrit."

Asahel sat down on the unipod, which sometimes did service as a milking stool. The weather door opened again, and a handsome girl appeared, all smiles and roses.

"Mandy," said Asenath, "you've got back early. Well, you put off your calash and things and come here and sit down on the tripod beside Asahel. I want to talk to you both for your good. I have been hesitatin' about the matter for a long time, but the time has come for me to do my duty, and when I have a duty to do I do it. And Caleb, you shell corn; think what a good wife I've been to you—as good as three common women."

Amanda sat down on the tripod, which was not a souvenir of any classic art, but another milking stool that the handy Asahel had made, and that he kept in the kitchen on the woodbox to have ready for use on winter mornings. Asenath rose up from her arm-chair, let fall the rags that she had been sewing and seized the courting stick.

Caleb looked around with open mouth. He saw that a storm was coming without any rainbow, and in any struggle in life his heart always turned towards the weaker opponent. He thought of what a wife she had been to him. "As good as four," he said to himself, multiplying.

He turned the side of his face guardedly towards the queer group—Amanda on the tripod and Asahel on the unipod, and his resolute wife, who stood like a kind of prophetess holding over them the courting stick.

"My bowels yearn with compassion for ye all, ye poor critters," said he, with an avast sort of motion of his rugged hand. He moved his corn basket into the shadows of the room, turned his back on the scene, and began to shell corn again with an electrical resolution, trying to review "what a good wife Asenath had been to him—as good as five or more."

"Now listen, both of ye," said Asenath, "for I am talking to ye for your good. I haven't got anything against you, Asahel. Think what a mother I've been to you, and what a wife I have been to Kalub there shellin' corn. But you are our hired man—just that and nothin' more. What more be ye, now? You are almost old enough to put on a pea-jacket and to go courtin'; and Amanda, come next Monday week, which is Thanksgivin' week, will be old enough to receive calls from some of the young property people. Now no one in one's senses would ever think of our Amanda's receiving any particular attention from our hired man. Asahel, that is plain talk, but don't you see it so?

"You two have been cowslippin' together, and sassafrasin' together, and a huntin' turkeys' nests and wild honey, and pickin' Indian pipe and all. Now that was all right when you were children. But, Asahel, you and Amanda have come to the pastur' bars of life, and you must part, and you, Asahel, must be content to become just one of our hired men and sit at the table with the other hired men, on Thanksgivin' days the same as on all other days, and not stand in the way of any one. And, Amandy Short, do you see that?"

Asenath held up the courting stick.

"Do you know what that is?"

"It is just a hollow stick. I've seen sticks before. What does all this mean?"

"You've seen sticks before, have you, Amanda? And you have experienced 'em, too, for I have been a faithful mother to you—as good as two. But this is the stick that must unite some farm to ours, and I am goin' to hang it up over the dresser, and when the right young man comes, Amanda, I want you to take it down and put it up to your ear, so, and it may be that you will hear somethin' useful, something to your advantage and ourn. I hope that I made myself clearly understood."

She did. The two young people had not been left in any darkness at all in regard to her solution of their social equation. Asahel stepped into the middle of the great kitchen floor. His face was as fixed as an image, and the veins were mapped on his forehead.

He bent his eyes on Asenath for a moment and then his soul flowed out to the tone of the accompaniment of honor.

"Mrs. Short, you were good to me as a boy and I will never do a thing against your will in your family affairs. My father prayed that I might have the ability to fulfill what he was unable to do in life. To inherit such a purpose from such a father is something to be grateful for, and now that I am disappointed in my expectation of Amanda I shall devote all that I am to my father's purpose in me. I am going to be a minister."

"You be, hey? But where is the money comin' from?"

"Mrs. Short, it is to come out of these two fists."

"Well, Asahel, I do like your grit. The good intentions of the father are strengthened in their children sometimes. Maybe it will be so with you."

"Mrs. Short, we have Thanksgivings for the harvest of the year, but the harvest seeds of right endeavors in those who have gone before us are more than any harvests that the hand of man ever sowed, and wherever my place at the Thanksgiving table may be, I shall never be wanting for something to be grateful for."

Poor tender-hearted Caleb, he shelled corn as never before during this painful scene. Suddenly he looked up and about for relief. His eye fell upon the courting stick.

"Here," said he to Amanda, who was crying, "just let us try this new comical machine, and see how it works. Mandy let's you and I have a little talk together. I'll put the thing up to my mouth so, and you just listen at the other end of it. There—I'm going to say something. Ready now, Mandy? Did you hear that?"

"Yes, father, I heard it just as plain as though you spoke it into my ear."

"You didn't hear anything in particular, did you, Asenath?"

"No, only a sound far away and mysterious like."

"Curis, ain't it, how that thing will convey sound in that way? I should think that some invention might come out of it some day. Now, Amanda, you just put your ear up to the funnel and listen again. Mandy," he continued through the tube, "if your heart is sot on Asahel, do you stand by him, and wait; time makes changes pleasantly." He put aside the tube. "There now, do you hear?"

"You didn't hear, mother, did you?" said Caleb to Asenath, glancing aside.

"No, Kalub."

"This is a great invention. It works well. Now let me just have a word with Asahel."

Amanda conveyed one end of the tube to Asahel's ear.

"Asahel." He took his mouth from the tube. "Did you hear?"

"You didn't hear anything, did you?" he said, looking toward Asenath.

"No, Kalub."

"Now, Asahel, you listen again," said Caleb, putting his mouth to the tube. "If your heart is sot on Mandy, you just hang on, and wait. Time will be a friend to you, and I will. There now, did you hear, Asahel?"

"You didn't hear anything, did you?" asked Caleb of Asenath again with a shake.

"I don't know," said Asenath, "it seems to me as though the hands are the hands of Esau, but that the voice is the voice of Jacob."

"Show! Well now, Amanda, you and Asahel talk now with each other. Here's the tube."

"Asahel Bow," said Amanda, through the tube. "I believe in you through and through."

"Amen!" said Asahel, speaking outside of the tube. "Amen whenever your mother shall say Amen and never until then. There is no need of any courting stick for me."

At this point of family history Caleb leaped around.

"I know what I did with it—I do now!"

"Did with what, Caleb?" asked Asenath.

"That letter for Asahel—it is right under my bandanna in my hat!"

Caleb went to his hat and handed the lost letter to Asahel.

The latter looked at it and said, "England." He read it with staring eyes and whitening face, and handed it to Mrs. Short, who elevated her spectacles again.

"That old case in chancery is decided," said he, "and I am to get my father's share of the confiscated property. I may have yet to wait for it though. My great-grandfather was Bow of Bow. He was accused of resisting the Act of Uniformity, and his property was withheld."

Asenath lifted her brows.

"Bow of Bow," she repeated. "He was a brave man, I suppose. Resisted the Act of Uniformity. How much did he leave?"

"An estate estimated at £20,000.

"Heavens be praised," said the suddenly impressible Asenath. She added: "I always knew that you had good blood in you and was an honest man, Asahel, just like your father; nobody could ever turn him from the right, no more than you could the side of a house; no Act of Uniformity could ever shape the course of old Seth Bow. And you are a capable man, Asahel; your poor father had limitations and circumstances to contend with, but you are capable of doing all that he meant to do. I always did think a deal of your father and I think considerable of your grandfather now. I always was just like a mother to you, now wasn't I, Asahel, good as two or more ordinary step-mothers and the like?

"'Bow of Bow,' 'Bow of Bow,'" continued Asenath. "Well, I have prayed that Amanda might marry well, and your part of £20,000 would be just about twenty times the value of the Smith farm, as I see it. That farm isn't anything but a bush pastur' anyhow.

"'Bow of Bow,' what a sort of grand sound that has. 'Bow of Bow.' I once had an uncle that was a stevedore, an English stevedore, or a caveleer, or something of the kind, but he didn't leave any estate like Bow of Bow. I think he uniformed in the time of the Uniformity."

"Asahel, you just put that there courtin' stick up to your ear once more, and let me say a word now that I have new light and understand things better."

Asahel obeyed. There came a response that could be heard outside of the hollow tube: "Amen." A murmurous sound followed which was understood only by Asahel. "You will overlook my imperfections, now, won't you, Asahel? Pride is a deceitful thing, and it got the better of me. I only meant well for Amandy, same as you do. I'm sorry for what I said, Asahel. Marry Mandy, and I'll be a mother to you as I always have been. As good as two common mothers, or more, same as I've always been to Kalub."

. . . . . .

Thanksgiving, the Bay Path, Hadley Meadows. The old folks sit by the west window now, in which the sun goes down. There is a coach in the Path, and on it Rev. Dr. Bow of provincial fame and his family, who are coming home. The ingleside, the oak table.

"Dr. Bow—Asahel—I shall always call you that—will you say grace?" said Caleb, bent and old. Asenath need not bow. She is bowed with the weight of years.

"O thou whose love brought the breath in the springtime, and to the autumn the crowns of harvest, we thank thee for this reunion and for all. We thank thee that there is no event in life that we may not glorify, that thy law compensates for all inequalities. We thank thee as a nation for what our fathers were; that the good purposes of the fathers are fulfilled in the sons, and that no right effort is ever lost."

"I will say amen, Asahel," said Asenath.

And Asenath said "Amen."

OTHER POLICEMEN.

BY REV. R. B. TOBEY.

Dr. Quint's last article for The Congregationalist is of special interest, not only because it was his last, but for the reason that it strikes the major chord of praise instead of taking up the minor strain of criticism and ridicule. But the Policeman at the Crossing is not sui generis; he is a type.

A close acquaintance with many members of the police force has disabused my mind of many prejudices. In relieving suffering and assisting to see justice done, some striking examples have come under my notice. The other day there came to my office a young woman under the protection of a policeman. A victim of man's lust, she had been turned out into the street by a cruel landlady who had seized her wearing apparel for rent. Penniless and grief-stricken, she sought the shelter of a station house and told the kind-hearted captain her story. He sent her to me, and with the aid of her police escort her clothes were secured and she was made comfortable.

One of our beneficiaries is an old man, a cripple. For several years some of the policemen in a certain district have maintained a quasi guardianship over him, taking care that he did not suffer want. When he became totally dependent and their resources were insufficient, they called attention to him and requested kindly offices in his behalf. On a certain occasion when we were compelled to go into court to fight a concrete evil, the opposition seemed insuperable, but the police captain in whose precinct the arrest occurred left his other duties and sat the day out in a determined effort that the offender should be punished.

Last year the Massachusetts legislature was asked to restore to the police relief fund the witness fees of the night officers, which twenty-five years ago were diverted from the treasury of this association to that of the city. The bill passed two stages, but was killed on the third reading. A member of the legislature stated to me that the defeat of the bill was due first to the sneer that the police had a "soft snap," while the members of another department of the public service were heroes, and to the ridiculous statement that night policemen would be tempted to arrest men for trivial reasons, so as to put them in court the next morning and secure the witness fees for the relief fund.

I have seen night officers in court who have been deprived of sleep for forty-eight hours because their presence as witnesses was demanded in the courtroom. It would take more than a few paltry witness fees to compensate for this deprivation. The exposure, and sometimes the suffering, involved in such experiences is a part of the "soft snap" of the police force. When we consider that these men work seven days out of the week, with a half-holiday only once in five weeks, and that they are exposed to all sorts of weather and most trying experiences, it may well be asked if the element of heroism is really lacking. As a matter of fact, evidences of bravery are constantly recurring. In the pursuit of information I was privileged to consult a number of documents at police headquarters bearing upon this point, and was surprised to find from physicians' certificates how many men were disabled temporarily and permanently by accidents and injuries received while in the discharge of duty. Whoever has seen an officer wrestling with a rum-crazed fiend has easily recognized of what fiber he must be. And when the not unusual episode is noted of officers overpowered by a mob while making an arrest, their efforts will bear comparison with those of soldiers on the battle-field.

Just now efforts are being put forth to secure once more for the police relief fund the witness fees of which they were deprived for some unknown reason. It is hoped and believed that legislation to this end can be secured this winter. The Boston Municipal League committee on public health and safety (known as the police committee) has petitioned the police commissioners to grant members of the force a "church leave" every other Sunday during such portion of the year as it can be granted with safety. It is desired to enlist the sympathy of all our citizens in behalf of this movement.

A suggestion is not out of place here. How many of us have a personal acquaintance with the officers of the routes where our homes are located? The criminal knows them, and watches them as the rat watches the cat, but as a rule we are altogether unconscious of the protection they constantly afford us. It is time we changed our attitude and talked them up, giving the policeman the recognition he deserves. I am always impressed in our courts of justice when the judge addresses him as "Mr. Officer." The very title thus given lifts him up from the plane where a mistaken public sentiment has placed him.

METHOD OF RELIEVING ARMENIAN ORPHANS.

BY SEC. JAMES L. BARTON, D.D.

To provide for the great mass of suffering, uncared for, stricken childhood it is not necessary to construct, at large expense, orphanages into which children can be gathered in great numbers, and which might obtain the opposition of the government. All through the stricken districts there are yet standing a large number of houses belonging to native Christians. In many cases the head of the house has been killed or has left the country or is completely impoverished. These houses vary in size, but many of them, if properly systematized and arranged, will easily accommodate from ten or fifteen to forty or fifty orphans. These houses could be secured, together with the services of the owners, for little, if anything, more than their food and clothing. For additional help, if necessary, the land is full of starving Christian widows, who would gladly give their services night and day living with the children in return for a safe home.

Throughout the villages wherever Christian houses remain the process could be repeated until houses sufficient were provided for all the destitute. There is no doubt that the Gregorians would unite in this plan and heartily co-operate in securing places and in collecting and bringing in the children and in looking after the work.

The orphans would be of all ages from mere babes to about ten years for boys and a higher age for girls. Boys above ten in many cases suffered the same fate as their fathers. Some of the places might be especially equipped for the babes, others for boys and others for girls, the classification simplifying the management and control. All of these so-called orphanages containing children of school age would necessarily be supplied with teachers. Those located near existing schools would probably make use of the schools.

Undoubtedly, with few, if any, exceptions, each child would need at the outset a bed and clothing. The food would be simple, but abundant and wholesome. After going over the details of expenses most carefully, based upon personal experiences in that country, it seems fair to estimate that the sums suggested in the editorial column of The Congregationalist will be sufficient, upon the average, for the purposes specified. Unless so provided for many of these orphan children must starve like Turkish dogs, naked and alone in the streets of their native town or amid the ruins of their desolated homes.

The Home

BOSTON'S FIRST THANKSGIVING.

BY THERON BROWN.

John Winthrop stayed his heart on God
That first New England year.
His faith unconquer'd looked abroad
With grand and patient cheer.
His buoyant voice was prophet's breath
To homes whose hope had flown,
In hunger, thirst, disease and death
That had not spared his own.

"Be strong, my people! Not in vain
We crossed the cruel sea.
Our Canaan, clad with spring again,
In Canaan's bloom shall be.
Short trials may not turn us back,
Nor fears our faith destroy,
Who walk in Jesus' thorny track
To win his heavenly joy."

O, dismal was the winter bleak
That shut the settlers in.
Their hasty village roofs were weak,
Their wooden walls were thin;
And famine, ere the frost took off
Its deadly hand, stole nigher,
To prowl by every kneading trough
And lurk at every fire.

John Winthrop bravely toiled and spent,
And shared the want and cold.
No less a chief in such lament
Had borne himself so bold.
"The Lord is gracious"—thus he spake—
"Now let his Israel pray.
Your sorrows to his altar take,
And keep a humble day."

Ah, still to suffer, wish and wait
Must Boston bend the knee.
And woe if England send too late
Her comfort o'er the sea!
Yet patiently the leader fed
His camp of starving souls
Till the last batch of Christian bread
Was baking on the coals.

And when one neighbor, sore bereft,
Preferred his meek appeal,
Of all the good man's store was left
A single scoop of meal.
He gave it—and, as if straightway
In sight God's angel flew,
Behold, full sheeted, up the bay
The stout ship Lyon blew!

"Rejoice! All Shawmut Cape come out!
Your fires of welcome flame!
Now all the king's plantations shout
And praise Jehovah's name!
He brings his children food at last;
Your sackcloth cast away,
For lo, tomorrow's published fast
Shall be Thanksgiving Day,"

John Winthrop said; and at his word
To every hamlet door
Full stock and hoard for shelf and board
The glad householders bore.
Then in the feast long waited for
They quenched their winter cares,
And blessed their godly governor
Between their psalms and prayers.

What loss if up the heavenly arch
There climbed no harvest sun?
What though they heard the winds of March
Before their joy was done?
What though John Winthrop's wife came not?
The time was ripe for praise
When love through suffering months had wrought
A land's Thanksgiving Days.

Let us do our duty, and pray that we may do our duty here, now, today; not in dreamy sweetness, but in active energy; not in the green oasis of the future, but in the dusty desert of the present; not in the imaginations of otherwhere, but in the realities of now.—Canon Farrar.

While Puritan principles, we fervently hope, have become firmly imbedded in our national life, yet Puritan customs have long ago disappeared. Of special days, outside Sunday, observed by our forefathers, only Thanksgiving seems to have retained its original idea—that of a joyous family festival. Fast Day, in Massachusetts at least, so lost its significance as to be dropped out of the calendar altogether, but may the time never come when we shall surrender or greatly modify this annual reunion of parents and children under the old roof tree. The spectacle of hundreds and thousands of them hurrying across the continent next week, from Maine to California and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast, for the sake of meeting together at the hearthstone around which cluster so many precious and hallowed memories, is a token that the springs of sentiment are not altogether dried up in this practical age. God be praised for this spirit of tender regard for the blessedness of household ties and childhood associations!

How often we misjudge each other from a failure to look beyond the horizon of our own experience and environment. "She's a very proud woman," severely remarked one of these careless censors, on seeing a somewhat elderly neighbor wearing a becoming dress and her hair crimped. Yet in that particular locality it was a positive refreshment to others to see one woman beyond middle age who was not sallow and wrinkled and regardless of her appearance. Harper's Bazar mentions the case of a hard-working literary woman who scornfully exclaimed concerning a certain author, "A society woman writing! Well, I suppose I ought to be glad that there is one of them who can do something not frivolous even if she does take the money away from us." Another comment was, "I never realized before that any one who had been in society could have a single sincere or honest purpose." The same journal points out a common tendency to think of dirt as a necessary concomitant to poverty, as illustrated in the action of a charity visitor who refused to order coal and food sent to a poor woman because her stove was blacked and her windows washed! Verily the old injunction, judge not, still has need of enforcement in modern society.

THANKFULNESS AS A MEANS OF GRACE.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Lips say God be pitiful,
That ne'er said God be praised, sang Mrs. Browning, crystallizing in a couplet a truth which every day's lack of gratitude to the generous Giver of all our good bears sorrowful witness. Our impulse in trial and pain is to call for help; in extremity we clamor for relief; in peril and darkness we lift up our hands to the heavens. Not always do we render the tribute of thanks to him who so bountifully spreads our tables, so wonderfully guides our way and so instantly aids us in our time of need. When have we ever gone to him in penitence and faith and been denied? When shall we ever get to the end of the mercies which make the outgoings of the morning and the evening to rejoice? Yet in our private devotions we sometimes forget to acknowledge our obligation to God, and as a people we have occasion to be reminded, as we are by the feast the fathers set, that our national life and institutions are tokens of his watchful care and ceaseless wisdom.

In considering thanksgiving as a means of grace, ought we not to make a special note of all from which we have been saved in the things that have not happened? How safe have been our journeys! How free from accident the tenor of our lives! How protected have been our homes! How long an immunity have we had from sickness, and how seldom has the angel of death spread his wing of darkness over our threshold! Yes, thanks be unto God for the sorrows we have not had to bear, for the calamities that have not fallen upon us and ours.

Thus on the negative side. But on the positive, what pleasure we have had with our dear ones as the years have sped! How the children have grown and flourished, doing well at school, showing nobleness and developing fine characters, how the business has prospered to which we have set our hands, how our lines have gone, if not to the ends of the earth, yet to such ends as we most desired, so that life has been blithe and full of song and sweetness and beauty! What rare and interesting people we have met, and how delightfully we have widened our circle of acquaintances, so that our lives are much enriched by the new faces and new voices and new intimacies which have come into them. Then in family history, so eventful under the roof, so sacredly sheltered from the outside intrusion, what sweets have there been of the birthday and the bridal, and the glad personal anniversary! What secrets of happiness, as pronounced and far more numerous than the secrets of care! Let us remember the years of the right hand of the Most High, and, remembering, let us thank God and take courage.

Not one of us but has a long record of direct and individual causes of gratitude to God, in help received to conquer innate inclination to sin, to resist temptation and to put Satan under our feet. Then, too, if we have had moments of hallowed communion, sweet glimpses of our Lord, a sense at times of his nearness, an increasing and most helpful realization of his presence with us in our various experiences, in our weakness as in our strength, our grief as in our joy, for all these we can but offer our "humble and hearty thanks."

Thanksgiving Day is so fully and sacredly the home day in our dear country that we must never suffer its glory to wane, nor allow its celebration to fall into decadence. The land over, trains are loaded with the children going back to the homestead, fathers bringing their boys and girls to visit the dear old people who grow young with their grandchildren about them, sons hastening to the mother's side once more, city folk seeking the country, country folk turning to the town. Homeward ply the shuttles, and roll the wheels; the very winds grow merrier as they blow on Thanksgiving eve, and the snow, if it happen to come, falls with an air of holiday.

And in our grateful thanks let us never leave out a memory of those for whom defeat and strife and struggle are over, for those, still ours, and still dearly beloved, who are safe in the city of the King, beyond the last river, beyond the touch of death, forever free, and forever living! Thanks be unto God for the great company of our kindred and friends who dwell where the song of praise is endless, in "Jerusalem the golden."

If they had cause for thankfulness
Who crossed the bitter sea,
To build within the wilderness
The altar of the free,
Who paused amid their bread of tears,
In exile and in pain,
To praise the God who hushed their fears,
And gave them sun and rain,
And seed that pierced the rocky soil,
And harvest ere the snow,
If they were glad, 'mid grief and toil,
Our fathers, long ago,
O! what rich chord of nobler song
Should we this hour uplift,
On whom so swift love's favors throng
Who reap so large a gift.
Father, from out thine open hand,
Through all our borders wide,
Drop bounties on our smiling land,
No prayer of want denied.
Receive our thanks that seek thee, Lord,
Our words are weak to say
Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Our heart-felt psalm this day.

Everything and everybody is glad on Thanksgiving, for

FAMILY PRAYERS A SAFEGUARD.

BY REV F. H. PALMER.

An instance recently came to my notice of a young man, going out into the temptations of a great city, who was urgently solicited to a form of sin to which by nature he was peculiarly susceptible. Hitherto he had been kept by the restraints of a happy, healthful home environment from feeling the real power of this particular form of evil. Now, separated as he was from those surroundings, the full force of opportunity and inclination asserted itself. It was the arch tempter's hour, and his special emissary was subtle and urgent. This young man was not a professing Christian. He was not particularly thoughtful or serious. But, as he afterward expressed it to a confidant, he listened a moment to the suggestions of the tempter, and then turned and actually ran as fast as his legs would carry him until a safe distance was placed between himself and the spot where he had felt so fearfully inclined to sacrifice his manhood and forsake the loving teachings of father and mother. It was a long while before he got over the shock which the awful strength of the temptation had given him.

This young man, though not consciously converted, was saved, in this first supreme test of his young manhood, by the family prayers of his father's home and the influences which accompanied them. The anchor held when the stress of the storm burst upon the frail barque of the voyager. We sometimes think that the few hurried verses read before the scattering of the family to their various occupations in the morning, or the brief petitions put up at night ere the sleepy-eyed children are sent off to their bedrooms, are not of much value. But there is, nevertheless, a saving power in them of which no Christian parent would wish his child deprived. God often works slowly. Perhaps we shall not see tomorrow the effect of today's faithfulness to duty or appropriation of privilege. But wait a while. By and by, in such an hour as ye know not, the Lord cometh. Some wise old Christian has said that he would not miss a single prayer meeting for fear that some duty, trial or temptation might be in store for him, the spiritual preparation for which was being offered to him by God in that particular service. If he missed it he would be all unprepared for that crisis. So many a link in the chain that is to hold our young men and women safe and sure from shipwreck by and by is being welded when we little suspect it in the faithful observance of the responsibilities of Christian nurture. We cannot afford to risk sacrificing or hurrying such an important means of grace as family worship.

In the writer's family it was noticed that the children were somewhat inattentive to the Scripture reading. To remove this difficulty it was proposed that at the close of the reading, which, by the way, is usually the mother's special part in the service, each in turn, beginning with the youngest, should put into words at least one lesson learned from that evening's passage. The interest of all was by this plan at once arrested and from that day our family prayers have had a new interest. The children vie with one another in noting, remembering and putting into their own original language the special lessons that appeal to them. The other evening, for example, we had the passage in St. Luke's gospel about the woman and the lost piece of silver, and also the parable of the Prodigal Son. After the reading little Helen said she had learned that when she was out to play and lost anything she must stop playing right off and hunt around until she found it. Gladys added that even if we were at work we ought to leave our work and look everywhere till we had found that which was lost. Cleave said that if we got a lot of money from our father or anybody we mustn't go off and spend it for rum and tobacco and such things, and Herbert completed the idea by suggesting that we could find right uses for our money in helping other people and doing good. A few words from mother and father enforced these lessons and pointed out the bearings of the parable and story in other directions.

Sometimes the comments of the children are exceedingly quaint and original. They show the older ones how much more the little members of the family circle take in than they are usually given credit for, and the glimpses into the beautiful realm of child nature are sweet and inspiring. As for the children, habits of attention, observation, translation of ideas and expression are thus cultivated, and surely spiritual as well as intellectual nourishment is garnered. After each has repeated from memory a verse of Scripture all kneel in prayer, joining in the Lord's Prayer at the close. We would far rather drop out the chief meal of the day than omit our family worship.

THANKSGIVING.

Through the long day the peasant woman went Gleaning the stalks the workers left behind
In the wide field—and yet, when day was spent,
But scarce an armful had she then to bind.

Two sheaves she made thereof—one small and fair,
And as she passed the shrine along the road
She left the tiny sheaf of gleanings there
In thankfulness, though light indeed her load.

—Flavel Scott Mines, in Harper's Bazar.

THE REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIER'S RETURN.

A STORY FOR THANKSGIVING.

The soldier had enlisted in that most adventurous and perilous branch of his country's service, privateering. He had left his home and family in the old town of Durham, Ct., not long before the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown. He had early experience of the varied fortunes of war, his vessel capturing at least one prize before it was in turn captured by a British man-of-war and taken to England. Instead of being confined in the prison at Portsmouth, as so many of his countrymen were, he, with perhaps others of the crew, was sent back some distance in the country, and boarded at an expense to the British Government of one shilling per week.

From this frugal style of living he was not released until the final treaty of peace, which was chiefly negotiated by the patience and skill of our wise ambassador, Benjamin Franklin. Family tradition attributes to Dr. Franklin some special interest and effort in behalf of these prisoners in the obscure country district. It was now the autumn of 1783. A long passage in a sailing vessel followed, without the luxurious appointments of a modern steamship, but with the happy realization that the long war for independence was over, that the American colonies had triumphed, and that he was going home! But would he find a home? Who would be there to greet him? He had heard nothing from them during the two years of his absence, nor had he been able to send any word to them.

Landing at New York he stopped only long enough to obtain the prize money due him, and then pushed on afoot towards his Connecticut home. It was considerably over one hundred miles; he had no bicycle, and the old-time roads in late November were not very favorable to rapid pedestrianism. But heart within and home ahead, he trudged on, although not without anxious misgivings. He reached the toll-gate in ancient Durham at nightfall. He ventured to ask the keeper if he knew whether a Mrs. W—— lived in Durham now. "Yes," was the reply, "the widow W——, and a hard time of it she has too, with her family of small children. They can't help her much, for they are all girls except the baby." That was good news—he did not know until now that he had a son, for the child was born after his sailing away on the privateer.

Pressing on with lighter heart and foot he reached his home, and found his daughters out of doors trying to gather in the poultry from the sleety storm which had begun. He helped them to accomplish their task, and they in turn invited the kind stranger to go in and warm himself, telling their mother of his help. He was a stranger to the mother also! His hair and beard were long, his face was browned, a sabre wound upon his face had materially changed his appearance. No word having been received from him or about him, especially when other American prisoners had returned, he had been given up as dead.

He warmed himself by the fireplace and entered into conversation with the woman of the home, asking whether she had always lived in Durham. No, she was born in Haddam, the next town. Did she ever know John Johnson of Haddam? Yes, e was her brother-in-law. Was she ever acquainted with Moses Parsons of Haddam? O yes, he was her father. He gave one more name and she replied quickly, "Are you that man?" He was not, but he had known him well years ago.

She would gladly ask this stranger, who was evidently from her native town, to stop for the night, but frankly told him that she had barely enough meal for herself and children, and she was cooking that for their supper. If he would go on to such a house, a mile and a half further, he would readily find a lodging. The stranger answered that he did not care for any food, that he was tired and did not wish to go out in the storm, and begged that he might be allowed to remain over night.

When the "hasty pudding" was ready it was put on pewter plates and he was given one. Eating sparingly, he soon persuaded the little boy, nearly two years old, to sit in his lap, and asked him his name. The child told it—"Stephen." The man said: "I had a brother by that name, and he gave me a pocket inkstand, which I have carried many years to remember him by. I will give it to you for your name," and took from his pocket the well-worn inkstand and gave it to the little boy. The mother, who had stood eagerly listening to the stranger's words, came up to him, lifted from his brow a lock of hair, discovering a scar, which she recognized—he was a stranger no longer!

This touching story which might have graced a work of fiction is not fiction at all, but a truthful tradition, carefully preserved and lovingly repeated in an old and well-known Connecticut family. It has just been repeated to me by a venerable lady, who is little Stephen's daughter and granddaughter of the Revolutionary soldier. Whenever repeated it has always ended as told above—the rest was too sacred to be put in words. But the heritage of patriotism from the privateersman prisoner has shown itself even to this day in earnest Christian lives, known by their works in the churches at home and in the missionary service abroad. THE BONDAGE OF DRESS.

The question of "deliverance from the bondage of dress," discussed in The Congregationalist of Oct. 29, is one that must often confront the earnest, serious-minded woman. Most of us desire to devote our time and mind to some special work. One is burning with zeal for benevolent and charitable causes, another loves art or literature with absorbing intensity, while still another bounds her desires by the home. She would have leisure to apply herself in various directions—to current events, music, social observances—in order to be a true helper in the home, fitted to enter intelligently into the interests of husband, son, daughter, and thus render temptation from without powerless to work harm. How can she do this while under bondage to dress, not free to dress neatly, becomingly, elegantly, according to her own sense of what these words imply, but bound by the dictates of fashion?

But is not the remedy in our own hands? Now and then a brave soul dares be independent, and receives the tacit, if unexpressed, respect of her less emancipated sisters. I think here of a lady from an old family in one of our large cities, whose standing did not depend upon her personal appearance. Passing one day in her walks a poor old woman sitting bonnetless by the sidewalk, grinding her hurdy-gurdy, she was moved with pity. On reaching home she sent her servant to the woman with the bonnet she had just removed from her own head. A few days later, passing the same spot, she saw the old woman sitting bonnetless as before, in the drizzling rain. Curiosity prompted the lady to inquire why the bonnet was not worn, when she received this reply: "Do you think I would wear that old-fashioned thing?" Which of these women, I ask, was in bondage to fashion, and with which would we be classed?

The late Maria Mitchell was an instance of independence in this matter, and she so influenced the pupils under her charge at Vassar that they gloried in it. They were proud of their Miss Mitchell appearing in her plain gray dress at gatherings of fashionably dressed people, any of whom were glad of recognition by the distinguished teacher with whom dress took its proper place—in the background. A friend of Gail Hamilton's told me years ago of her impatience at having to occupy her mind with what she should wear. "Find me a dressmaker" she pleaded, "who will know what I ought to have and will procure material and make my things for me. I don't want to have to think anything about it."

We have not all such an assured position, from intellect or family descent, that we can afford to be unmindful of our personal appearance. But if one be innately a lady it will appear, whatever her garb. I recall my dear mother, who in order to give her daughters the advantages she desired for them must make many sacrifices. A young friend of mine, accustomed to some degree of wealth and luxury in her own home, was a frequent visitor in ours. She said to me one day: "I visit at a house, and I come back again after a year and find some one wearing the same dress as before, but nice in every way, and always a lady, and my love and respect for her grow mightily." No name was mentioned, but I knew. I often think if we could realize the influence upon young girls of one who can afford to dress simply and yet always look the lady, we might be willing to remit, for their sakes, this constant striving after the latest fashion.

The various organizations of intelligent women to be found at this day in all our cities and towns might exert a more direct influence in this particular. From them does come an impulse for good, in that their club work demands time which would formerly have been devoted to the pursuit of fashion or the requirements of society. But I believe most profoundly in individual conviction and individual effort. Let the mothers of the land, let the teachers in our schools and colleges for girls see to it that their example and precept are what they should be, and the years to come will witness a higher standard among women. The change is coming. The very chafing of women under their bonds is the beginning of the end. Let each individual woman, by her own example and by her influence over those in her charge, do what she may to hasten this end. S. C. H.

EARLY THANKSGIVING DAYS.

The first recorded Thanksgiving was the Hebrew feast of the tabernacles.

The first national English Thanksgiving was on Sept. 8, 1588, for the defeat of the Spanish Armada.

There have been but two English Thanksgivings in this century. One was on Feb. 27, 1872, for the recovery of the Prince of Wales from illness; the other, June 21, 1887, for the Queen's Jubilee.

The New England Thanksgiving dates from 1633, when the Massachusetts Bay Colony set apart a day for thanksgiving.

The first national Thanksgiving proclamations were by Congress during the Revolutionary War.

The first great American Thanksgiving Day was in 1784, for the declaration of peace. There was one more national thanksgiving in 1789, and no other till 1863, when President Lincoln issued a national proclamation for a day of thanksgiving. Since that time the President has issued an annual proclamation.—Journal of Education.

At a meeting of locomotive engineers the following toast was offered: "To our mothers—the only faithful tenders who never misplaced a switch."—Springfield Union.

He who is truthful, just, merciful, kindly, does his duty to his race and fulfills his great end in creation, no matter whether the rays of his life are not visibly beheld beyond the walls of his household, or whether they strike the ends of the earth.—Lord Lytton.

Closet and Altar

Begin each day by tarrying before God and letting him touch you. Take time to meet God.

Thanksgiving is good, but thanks-living is better.—Henry.

I believe it! 'Tis thou, God, that givest, 'tis I who receive:
In the first is the last, in thy will is my power to believe;
All's one gift: thou canst grant it moreover as prompt to my prayer
As I breathe out this breath, as I open these arms to the air.

—Browning.

Many favors which God giveth us ravel out for want of hemming, through our own unthankfulness; for, though prayer purchaseth blessings, giving praise doth keep the quiet possession of them.—Thomas Fuller.

Am I to thank God for everything? Am I to thank him for bereavement, for pain, for poverty, for toil? Must I lift up my hands over my dead and say: "Father, I thank thee that thou hast taken away my friend"? Is it pleasing to my Father that loss should be pleasant to me? Is it good that I should be told to give thanks in everything? Be still, my soul, thou hast misread the message. It is not to give thanks for everything but to give thanks in everything. It is not to praise God for the night but to bless him that the night is not deeper. I have read of the Son of Man that he gave thanks over the symbol of his broken body. Not for the pain, but for the mitigation of pain, did the Son of Man give thanks—not that his body was broken, but that it was broken for me. In thine hour of sorrow give thanks like Jesus.—Matheson.

Gather the harvest of our prayers—
The harvest of our gratitude—
For life, and all that makes it sweet,
For health and strength, for air and food,
And let the incense of this day—
Set thus apart for joy and praise—
Burn in our loving hearts through all
The year's gift-crowned days.

O God of love, we render thee hearty thanks for all thy mercies, but especially for thine unspeakable gift, Jesus Christ, thy Son, in whom all gifts and blessings are included. We praise thee that thou dost keep mercy and truth with thy people from generation to generation. Bless our mingling together this Thanksgiving time. May our home friendships become more and more deep and tender. We make special prayer for the children. We thank thee for childhood and for all it means to homes and to this world. We pray for the aged ones. In the evening of their lives may the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ illumine their pathway. We bless thee today, O God, for the common faith which binds together thy great household of believers throughout the world. Quicken us all by thy Holy Spirit. We praise thee for our glorious heritage as a nation. Preserve us from unbelief and all forms of unrighteousness. What shall we render unto thee, O Lord, for all the mercies which have crowned this year? We will take the cup of thanksgiving and call upon thy holy name and offer the sacrifice of praise in the name of Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

100. CHARADE.

The blue nosed TOTAL cares not for duty
Or discipline, over much;
A languid, passionate Southern beauty—
You have surely heard of such.

Though ONE may TWO him in some degree,
With the best of education
He and his record, I fear, will be To ONE but a poor relation.

He sits at ease in his circus pen,
Hunched up like a 'cycle scorcher,
And sees a sergeant putting his men
Through evolutional torture.

He flattens his nose against the glass
With a look of contemptuous wonder
At that cold squad on the frosty grass
That the blue-nosed ONE TWOS yonder.

THREE REASONS.

I once met a thoughtful scholar who told me that for years he had read every book he could which assailed the religion of Jesus Christ, and he said he should have become an infidel but for three things: "First, I am a man. I am going somewhere. Tonight I am a day nearer the grave than I was last night. I have read all such books can tell me. They shed not one solitary ray of hope or light upon the darkness. They shall not take away the only guide and leave me stone blind. Second, I had a mother. I saw her go down into the dark valley where I am going, and she leaned upon an unseen arm as calmly as a child goes to sleep on the breast of its mother. I know that was not a dream. Third, I have three motherless daughters (and he said it with tears in his eyes). They have no protector but myself. I would rather kill them than leave them in this sinful world if you blot out from it all the teachings of the gospel."—Bishop Whipple.

The common problem, yours, mine, every one's,
Is not to fancy what were fair in life,
Provided it could be; but, finding first
What may be, then find how to make it fair
Up to our means.

THREE cheers for the old flag—and three times three, if you feel specially patriotic!

VERMONT.

Dear Mr. Martin: In these times of flag-raisings there has been a question as to just how the stars and stripes should hang. Will you kindly give in the Conversation Corner any information on the subject? Also, when is a flag at half mast? HELEN P.

Vermont has always been so grandly loyal to the nation and its ensign that all her sons and daughters assuredly ought to know "how the stars and stripes should hang!" Perhaps I do not understand the point of the question. Of course, the "union"—that is, the corner containing the stars—should be uppermost; to hoist the flag with the "union down" is either a stupid blunder or else a sign of special distress. In putting up a flag be careful and hoist so that the halyard fastened to the top of the flag goes up first. The flag is hoisted "at half mast"—i. e., half way to the top of the mast or flag pole—as a sign of the death of some one on board of a vessel approaching port, or of some prominent citizen or public officer on shore. Sometimes it is thus placed as a sign of distress on board the ship which carries it.

. . . I wrote the above yesterday—election day—and stopped to hear the news, coming all night long, from our forty-five States, news which makes me "feel specially patriotic," so that at early morning I went "aloft" and answered again Helen's "question as to just how my stars and stripes should hang"! I speak of this freely, because I have no doubt that the great majority of you feel the same way and, long before you will read this, have had your part in cheering for the "old flag." It has not been a contest of parties, as usual, but one of principles. Hundreds of thousands of Democratic voters, including the President and his Cabinet, have united with the Republicans—and Confederate soldiers with Union veterans—in deciding that the nation shall have honest money, and not cheat its own people or other nations; that the great reform in "civil service" shall go forward and not backward; that the judges of our nation shall not be made or unmade by politics; and that the President shall have power to subdue riot and anarchy anywhere in the land.

All that political orators have promised may not be fulfilled, but these four things belong to right and justice and honesty in our Government. Without them our Government would certainly be in danger. I think we young people should remember this lesson of the election, too, when in the future it is questioned whether such great questions, on which depend the prosperity and safety of the nation, ought to be decided by the votes of millions of people, scattered over the continent, many of them ignorant or vicious or prejudiced. When the occasion comes—as in 1860 and 1896—the good sense and conscience of all the people will be aroused, and they will settle the question rightly. Yes, the republican or democratic form of government is better than a monarchy, about which something was said in last week's Corner Scrap-book. But the people of a republic must know something, must think for themselves, must be honest—that is why the Corner takes the liberty to talk about these things so much. And now, having settled the national problem, let us see what the children have to say.

NORFOLK, CT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I think that the reason why the French presidents resign is because they are not wholly protected from anarchists; at least, that is why M. Casimir resigned the office. French presidents are elected for seven years. I am a Cornerer. CLAUDE K.

Yes, I know you are, and I ought to have printed your word about the French presidents before (see Corner, June 18), but it comes in nicely this week. Would it be better if our presidents were elected for seven years, rather than four? I am sorry that the "biennial amendment" failed to be confirmed by the people of Massachusetts this election, for it seemed to promise an improvement, in the way of having State officers and legislators continue in office two years, and so be better fitted to perform their duties. By the time it comes up again, you will—some of you—be able to vote on it!

KEEVILLE, MINN.

Mr. Martin; Dear Sir: May I ask a ? of your Cornerers? I enjoy reading the letters and have found much information in that way, so now I want to ask those geographically inclined if they can tell me where Mt. Kilhorn is. It is one of a series of questions in an elementary geography, but I have been unable to find its location, either by research or inquiry. MAUDE T.

If any of you know where Mt. Kilhorn is, raise your hands!

DORCHESTER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I want to tell you how much I enjoy reading the letters that the boys and girls write to the Conversation Corner. My sister and I have been interested in collecting different kinds of worms, and watching them turn into chrysalids or spin a cocoon in which to spend the winter. I found a black and yellow worm feeding on the milkweed leaves, which turned into a very beautiful light green chrysalis with golden buttons on it. In a few more days we expect to see the butterfly. I have earned nearly enough for my missionary dollar this year. HELEN C.

That must be a very interesting study. Since mentioning a few weeks ago books on insects, I have heard warmly recommended a larger one, with full descriptions and fine illustrations and plates. If you wish to pursue the study scientifically, inquire for Hyatt's Insecta (Heath & Co., Boston: price, $1.25.)

HYDE PARK, MASS.

Dear Sir: The "baby blue eyes," spoken of in the Conversation Corner lately [Sept. 24, Oct. 22], is Nemophila insignis. If you could see them covering some of the California hillsides in early spring, you would almost think a piece of the blue sky was spread out before you. There is another variety, Nemophila maculata, which is quite common in many parts of California. It has somewhat larger flowers than the other: they are white, with a dark purple spot at the outer edge of each petal. The seeds of both of these are sold by florists, but they thrive best where Mother Nature planted them. B. H. L.

I have a ? in natural history. Bicycling the other day with an observant boy through the woods, we heard at a distance, for a considerable time, sounds like those of a hammer. But there was no house in the direction from which the sounds came, nor do I think any Massachusetts mechanic would pound so slowly! The boy thought it might be a bird, and suggested a query in the Corner.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

The Long-Lived Queen. One advantage of a monarch's reign—especially if prolonged like that of Queen Victoria, referred to in this column last week—must be the thorough knowledge of other rulers and the public affairs of other nations. In 1844 Nicholas I., Autocrat of all the Russias, visited Victoria. She wrote this about him in her diary: "He gives Albert and myself the impression of a man who is not happy. . . . I think his immense power weighs heavily on his head." He reigned thirty years and died in the midst of the Crimean War. Alexander II., his son, reigned twenty-five years; Alexander III. thirteen years until 1894. Now Nicholas II., the reigning czar, great-grandson of the royal guest of 1844, comes to England and finds Victoria still on the throne. (You remember that the Czar's Czarina is Queen Victoria's granddaughter.) Query: Is this better than our system of changing rulers once in four years?

Another Granddaughter of the Queen of England I have just read about. She was Maud Wales—so to speak—and is now the wife of Prince Charles of Denmark. Like many other sensible persons, not of royal blood, she uses a bicycle. She warns pedestrians out of her way with six little bells, alternately gold and silver, which are attached to a band of white leather studded with turquoise gems. I wish the item had stated whether she rides a Columbia, a Warwick or a Crescent; also, whether, despite her gold and silver bells, she fell off a few times while learning to ride!

The Little Queen Who Was Snowballed. A lady sends me for your Scrap-book an amusing incident of Wilhelmina, the young Queen of Holland. It happened four years ago, when she was about twelve years old. Driving with her mother they suddenly came upon two or three schoolboys, who were engaged in the amusing act of snowballing some little girls. Wilhelmina immediately jumped out and commanded her young subjects to stop. That they did not propose to do, and at once began to fire their missiles at the little Queen herself. She bravely stood her ground, filled her hands with snow and was about returning the charge when a royal officer appeared and asked the sportive boys if they knew that they were snowballing the Queen of Holland. They, of course, did not and instantly disappeared. Then the queenly girl laid down her handfuls of snow sadly, saying to her mother, "I do wish I could have thrown it at them!" What a pity she had not been allowed to do so—it would have done her good, and those boys would have exulted to their latest day that they had snowballed with the Queen!

English Nurses for Royal Children. I have just seen the interesting statement that nearly all the royal nurseries of Europe are in charge of English women. The present Emperor of Germany, as well as his brothers and sisters, were brought up by an English nurse. This was also the case with the young Queen of the Netherlands, the present King of Portugal, the young King of Spain, the crown prince of Sweden, the children of the King of Greece and the "Grand Duchess Olga," the little daughter of the Emperor and Empress of Russia, the nurse for the latter having been specially selected by Queen Victoria. The relationship of V. R. to some of the other families suggests that she had something to do with the other selections too. It certainly will not do any of the royal children any harm to be under the discipline and instruction of a good English woman for a time! It may be one way of bringing about the time which some anticipate, when the English speech and English type of character shall control the world!

LESSON FOR NOV. 29. 1 Kings 10: 1–10, 13.

THE FAME OF SOLOMON.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

Sheba was in southern Arabia, on the east of the Red Sea and about 1,500 miles from Jerusalem. Christ speaks of the Queen of Sheba as the Queen of the South, and of her country as the end of the earth. Nothing more than this is known of her, though the Arabs have named her Balkis and have many legends of her beauty, wealth and wisdom. But her visit to Jerusalem is described simply to emphasize the greatness of God's chosen people and to illustrate the fulfillment of his promise to make them a mighty nation. That greatness culminated in Solomon. This incident suggests to us:

1. How Solomon's fame was made. It must have been great, since the queen of a land so distant as Sheba was constantly hearing about it. It must be remembered that there were then no newspapers, steam or regular lines of travel to spread news. It had taken centuries to make Solomon's fame. The work of Abraham and Moses, of Samuel and David, had entered into it, and that of countless unnamed Israelites. Every honorable man is more indebted to others than to himself for his good name. The unknown teachers of Shakespeare and Milton, of Washington and Lincoln, may have done greater service to mankind than their illustrious pupils.

Solomon's fame was "concerning the name of Jehovah." Those who told of his wisdom said he had received it from his God. It had been promised him in secret, but he must have acknowledged it openly or the news of it could not have spread so far. They who use wisdom wisely confess that God is its source. That wins the confidence of the good. "Them that honor me I will honor."

Solomon's fame was for a purpose beyond himself. He stood before the world for a nation through which God was to bless mankind. His fame prepared the nations for the coming of him who is perfect wisdom. Every honorable reputation reaches farther in blessing than he who has it can know. It has a place in a divinely appointed plan to perfect the kingdom of God.

2. How Solomon's fame was tested. The queen's idea of wisdom seems to have been the power to solve puzzles and to discover meanings hidden in enigmas. She came to Solomon in a manner which acknowledged his royal position; but she proposed to acknowledge his claim to wisdom, not by hearsay, but only after testing it. She sought not the king of Israel only, but him who gave wisdom to the king. Surely deeper questions were in her heart than the riddles she propounded, and Solomon's answers did more than to strengthen his fame. They confirmed the great fact that Jehovah gives wisdom. Every one who claims to have been enlightened by the Holy Spirit is on trial. Some questioner may at any time be looking beyond the answer to see if it be really possible to get wisdom by asking it of him "who giveth to all liberally and upbraideth not."

The tests the queen applied were not questions only. She inspected the management of Solomon's household, the conduct of his attendants and his habits of worship [v. 5]. If any one has really received wisdom from above it will appear in the ordering of his house, in his ways among men and in his entire life. The result of the test in this case was glorious. It left the queen breathless with amazement, moved by an awe which had seen not genius only, but divine inspiration.

3. How Solomon's fame was rewarded. The queen declared that his greatness surpassed his fame, and that her admiration had been doubled by her investigations. Far more than that, it turned her thoughts to the God who had made him king, and who, in doing it, had shown to the stranger his love to his chosen people and his own character in appointing men to power that they may "do judgment and justice" [v. 9]. The life of the good man reveals even to heathen the true character of God and his service in doing this is his royal crown. The queen acknowledged Solomon's greatness by laying her royal treasures at his feet. She bestowed on him in lavish abundance money, jewels, spices, perfumes. And this was but one illustration of what Solomon's fame brought him. Monarchs far and near delighted thus to honor him. Hiram's navy brought him the treasures of distant lands. It is noteworthy that one chief use which the king made of what he received was to adorn the house of the Lord and furnish instruments of music to aid in public worship [v. 12].

This record illustrates the divine law, "To him that hath shall be given." Giving to God does not impoverish, it inspires trust. Divine wisdom received usually guides a man to worldly success. The life of moral healthfulness gives the highest use of all his powers. It wins for him esteem and confidence. Good men rejoice in his prosperity. Boys and girls should be taught that those who are loyal to God and loving toward men, though they may be subjected to severe tests, may expect in this life to receive generous reward. Joseph was cast by envious brothers into a pit to die; and when he was rescued it was by selfish men who sold him into slavery. If he had been soured by the injustice which repeatedly fell on him, he would only have received the more abuse. But by making himself useful, even to unjust masters, he came to be valued. Then after years of patient service he lost all he had won by the cruel lust of one whom he sought honorably to serve. Still his heart did not fail him.

> His strength was as the strength of ten,
> Because his heart was pure.

In prison he set himself again to help men and he cheerfully continued it till he had won a royal place. Then he used that place to bless his brothers who had sought to kill him. Such wisdom could not be hid. Men hunt for those who have it as they hunt for gold and, finding them, prize them at last at their true worth. God's jewels are not slighted, even in worldly markets.

4. How Solomon's fame was maintained. When the queen had by her gifts expressed her regard for him and for his God who had given him wisdom, he returned her regard as became a king. He gave her everything she asked for, and then added more from his royal bounty. She saw in him the God who had given him the wisdom she admired. He felt that his gifts must not be measured by her need, but must sustain her estimate of his character. So the service we render to others must be measured not by their necessity or their capacity to appreciate it, but by his character from whom we have received what we have. "Freely ye have received, freely give." A poor woman with a sick daughter at home, one day, as she was passing a royal conservatory, looked longingly through the windows at luscious bunches of grapes hanging on the vines. A young lady within, seeing her, asked her why she gazed so hungrily at the grapes. She spoke tremblingly of her sick child, whose parched lips they would cool. Then the girl piled great bunches on her lap, till, almost breathless with astonishment, she managed to say: "I cannot take them all. I do not need so many." But the giver replied, "I cannot afford to give you less, for I am a princess." Those who are chosen kings and priests unto God will serve men according to their own royal natures. Like Solomon, when the receivers have had their desires satisfied, then of their royal bounty they will awaken and satisfy still nobler desires and so prove themselves true children of the King of kings.

Decreased Contributions. We have scarcely ceased to exchange congratulations that the American Board by a supreme effort closed its financial year without a debt, yet we are confronted with the fact that already two months of the new year have passed and the treasury does not warrant the hoped-for advance. On the contrary, it will be seen by the tables below that as compared with last year there has been a falling off in the item of regular donations as well as in the total receipts:

The New Woman in China. A remarkably hopeful portion of the annual report of the Woman's Board of Missions relates to the eager interest in Christianity in the Foochow Mission. Such large additions have been made to the churches that at one or two of them men are stationed at the gate of the overcrowded building, allowing only members, learners and their friends to enter. "Is this just the open door which we wish to offer to the unsaved Chinese?" is the pointed question asked. But to one who appreciates the position of women in China incidents which Miss Newton tells in regard to the development of some of the schoolgirls will appeal as a striking sign of the times. We read: "One of the pupils of our boarding school, who had achieved distinction as the naughtiest girl in school, touched by the Holy Spirit, developed wonderful talent for soul winning, and in her lovely home among the hills began a quiet work till some were baptized; a little chapel was bought, and they asked her to be preacher as well as teacher. Another old pupil, whose loving tact as pastor's wife had been as winning as her husband's preaching and whose voice had had good training for public speaking in caring for an aged, deaf father-in-law, has emerged as the finest speaker in the woman's annual meeting." It is to those trained in our boarding, women's school and hospital that our missionaries must turn in this crisis when the need of efficient native helpers is great.

THE WORLD AROUND.

Just from Alaska. After an official tour of several months Dr. Sheldon Jackson has recently returned to Washington, bringing fresh news of the governmental work in Alaska. He reports the schools to be in good condition and pays a high tribute to the teachers who have left their homes in the States for that isolated country, so far removed from civilization that most of them receive but one mail a year. A new Government day school was to be opened this fall by a brave young Washington girl, Miss Fulcomer, at Circle City, about 1,400 miles in the interior of Alaska. The miners in the vicinity raised a fund and built the schoolhouse. Dr. Jackson brought home with him two native girls ten years old, who have been placed in the Indian school in Carlisle, Pa. The Government's reindeer experiment is proving entirely satisfactory. The sudden influx of miners has created a demand for the deer for freighting purposes, and it looks as though these animals, originally imported to provide food for the starving natives, may prove an important factor in the opening up and development of the interior. Arrangements are being made for the establishment of a permanent line of reindeer teams from the mining camps to the Yukon River boats.

Dr. Barrows's Indian Lectures. A London exchange, The Christian Commonwealth, prints an interesting interview with Dr. J. H. Barrows of Chicago concerning his course of lectures to be delivered in India the coming winter on Christianity and Its Fitness to Be the World Religion. He expects to land in Bombay, Dec. 14, go directly to Calcutta, lecturing first in that city while the Indian National Congress is in session. The succeeding three months will be spent in speaking in several of the leading Indian cities. He has been invited by missionary bodies to give his course of lectures in Madras, Bengal, Bombay, Lahore and Vellore. A gratifying feature of the new undertaking is the cordial welcome extended to Dr. Barrows, not only by Christian people, but by his Oriental friends of other faiths who were at the Parliament of Religions and by the bodies they represent. The titles of the six lectures making up the series are: The World-wide Aspects of Christianity, The World-wide Effects of Christianity, The Christian Doctrine of God as the Basis of a Universal Religion, The Universal Book, The Universal Man and Saviour, The Historical Character of Christianity as Confirming Its Claims to World-wide Authority. These lectures will of course be given in English to audiences of educated Hindus, who are thoroughly familiar with the language.

In answer to the question, "Do you as a representative of Christianity propose to make any concessions in order to gain Hindus?" Dr. Barrows replied: "If Hindus ever do accept Christianity, and I believe they will, I have no doubt that they will accept historic Christianity, not in all its later developments, but in its primitive form. The main articles of the Apostles' Creed constitute the substance of faith. Hindu pantheism has a tremendous hold on the Oriental mind; the Hindu clings to his doctrine of God, and I know of nothing that can supplant it except the more glorious doctrine of God as revealed in Jesus Christ his Son. The only concessions which Christianity is ever called upon to make are concessions to the truth. We must acknowledge that the Spirit of God has taught very important and essential truths to non-Christian minds, and one chief hope of the missionary and of the Christian lecturer is to show that Christianity fulfills all the higher aspirations and completes all the imperfect revelations of the non-Christian world. I do not go to India to ask any Hindu, Buddhist, Mohammedan or Parsee to give up one single atom or iota of moral or spiritual truth which he now holds, but I ask him to candidly consider the question whether the truth is not found in Christ in a completer and purer form, and whether it is not made radiant and authoritative by the divine person and supernatural work and the unspeakable love of Jesus Christ."

Slavery in a British Protectorate. The consular report of Mr. O'Sullivan, British exconsul at Pemba, reveals some startling and surprising facts to those who have the impression that slavery in British possessions is a thing of the past. Not only does slavery exist with all its horrors on this island dependency of Zanzibar, but there is every reason to believe that in this part of the world the slave trade is still a flourishing institution. It is a pitiable picture which Mr. O'Sullivan draws of the present condition of the slave in Pemba. The Arab proprietors are inexorably stern and exacting taskmasters. The slave is a chattel, a beast of burden. He lives in what may by courtesy be called a hut. He is allowed to till a small portion of land for his own support on two days of the week. The remaining five he devotes to his master's work except in harvest season, when the miserable drudge is compelled to work seven days for his master, receiving as a recompense a very small portion of the fruits of his labor. When he is worn out he is treated worse than a beast—deprived of his hut and land and discarded without mercy. Although slaves die like flies on the island there is always an abundant supply of them—sufficient evidence that not all the slave dhows are captured by watchful British cruisers patrolling the African coast. There are, however, various agencies which are undermining this degrading traffic in the Dark Continent. The influence of the numerous missions in the Nyassa country is making the work of the Moslem slave-raider more difficult every day. Moreover, the encouragement of legitimate trade by the German settlements and the British East Africa Company, the gradual extinction of the African elephant—for slaves have always been the bearers of ivory—and the building of railroads must eventually put a stop to the slave trade. In the meantime, however, something should be done for the wretched sufferers in Pemba, and the London Mail, to which we are indebted for our facts, advocates the annexation of the islands and the incorporation of the sultanate of Zanzibar with the rest of the Queen's dominions as the only remedy.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Nov. 29–Dec. 5. How to Get Good out of Our Troubles. Psalm 27: 1–14.

Our first thought when we get into trouble is apt to be how can we get out of it most easily. Such a desire is natural, and it is right for us to use every legitimate means to escape from our ills and woes. But it is more important when trouble comes to think of the possibility of evoking good from it. We have entered only a little way into the real meaning of life if we are looking continually for a door of escape out of our difficulties and are blind to the blessing wrapped up in them. It is cowardly to want to escape our life's burdens, and it is a hero's part to accept an inevitable fate and make it serve one's highest interests. Little by little God teaches us that there may be better uses of trouble than to get rid of it altogether, to buy our way out of it, to change our environment, to turn our back altogether upon it. By and by one wakes up to the conviction that his sorrow or his sickness may not be intended by God to be put away from him. It may become the richest blessing of his life. So the old legend of St. Christopher repeats itself, and many a man, chastened by discipline, discovers that the cross which he is perpetually bearing about with him is none other than the Christ himself. This has been the experience of hundreds of God's saints.

Trouble yields blessing, also, when we put our own little difficulties over against the great burden and the woe of the world. Such a step almost always lightens our own trouble, while it is sure to deepen our sympathies and thus our natures. This is a weary, sin stricken world, despite all the forces at work for its redemption. We grow more human and more helpful to our kind when the burden which rests on us leads us to a deeper consideration of the trials which afflict humanity. It is thus that we enter into the fellowship of the world's suffering and are thereby fitted to help save the world.

Trouble fulfills its highest service to us when it brings us nearer God. It may be doubted whether the greatest intimacy with our Heavenly Father is possible without such affliction of our souls as makes us conscious of what God is and of what God wants to be to us. When our troubles bear us on to the central places of our Father's love they cease to be troubles, and it seems possible to realize, even in this world of disappointment and distress, Jesus' injunction, "Let not your heart be troubled."

BOOK REVIEWS.

MONSIGNOR DE SALAMON'S MEMOIRS.

Monsignor De Salamon was the Papal Internuncio at Paris from 1790 to 1801, during the Revolution. He left three graphic sketches of his experiences which remained unknown until discovered in 1891 by the Abbé Bridier, who since then has edited them and arranged them, with notes, documents, etc., in a volume. The work has three divisions. One describes the author's imprisonment at the Abbaye with a number of Catholic priests. Another tells of scenes in the Chambre des Vacations, a legal tribunal, of which he was a member, before which lawsuits were brought during the interval caused by the suppression of the parliaments. The third deals with events which occurred under the Directory, his arrest, trial and acquittal.

The author appears to have been one of those clerical personages whose spiritual qualities are less conspicuous than their social and political interests and aspirations. He hardly can be said to have been devout. And the chief value of his records lies less in their revelations of ecclesiastical or spiritual history than in their pictures of political changes and of other personal risks or calamities which befell him or others. It throws fresh light upon the spirit of the revolutionists, their reckless disregard of law and good sense and their cold blooded brutality, and it is enlivened by anecdotes as well as written in a natural and vivacious style.

It adds less to the stock of popular information about the Revolution than we expected. But it is more entertaining and it affords inherent evidence of fidelity to the life of the time. The Abbé Bridier has edited it judiciously and it well deserves a place with the rapidly increasing literature of its subject. [Little, Brown & Co. $2.00.]

RELIGIOUS.

Histories of Congregational churches are becoming so common that they attract somewhat less attention than formerly. But there is none the less an increasing appreciation of their great and permanent value. The latest example of the sort to reach us is the History of the First Congregational Church of Marietta, Ohio, by Rev. C. E. Dickinson, D. D., the pastor, and with an introduction by ex-President Simpson, D. D., LL. D. It covers a century of church life. The church was the first Congregational church in Ohio and the third church of any sort. Its present pastor has had but five predecessors. The first was Rev. Daniel Story and his successors have been Rev. S. P. Robbins, Rev. L. G. Bingham, Rev. Thomas Wickes, D. D., Rev. T. H. Hawkes, D. D., and Dr. Dickinson. Dr. Dickinson has shaped his material into a concise but well ordered and eminently readable narrative, which is accompanied by the usual tables, lists, etc., and is illustrated freely. It is a volume creditable to all concerned.

The IXth volume of The Ante-Nicene Fathers [Christian Literature Co. $4.00], edited by Prof. Allan Menzies, D. D., is an original supplement to the American edition. It contains the gospel of Peter, the Diatessaron of Tatian and a number of other productions of the early fathers, some of which are recently discovered additions to early Christian literature. Two of the most important commentaries of Origen, that on John, Books 1-10, and Matthew, Books 1, 2 and 10-14, are included. Several scholars of repute have rendered aid to the editor, and the volume, which is issued in the same style as the series which it follows, is an appropriate addition thereto.

The admirable papers which Rev. F. W. Tomkins, Jr., contributed to this journal during the last Lenten season, which were widely read and evidently exerted a large influence, have been gathered into a neat little volume, The Christian Life [E. P. Dutton & Co. 75 cents]. They blend piety and practical good sense effectively, and are written in so clear, earnest and tender a manner that they are very impressive. We are sure that the welcome which they received when published separately will be extended afresh to them in the form of a volume.——Grace Abounding for the Forgiveness of Sins [Bonnell, Silver & Co. $1.00], by Rev. G. F. Pentecost, D. D., contains five sermons originally preached in the Marylebone Presbyterian Church in London and repeated in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York in the course of last summer. They expand the subject of divine forgiveness in the preacher's practical and pungent fashion. And in spite of some extravagant statements, such as that "the damned in hell are forgiven sinners," although damned because unwilling to accept God's forgiveness, the discourses are likely to do good.

One of the best books of advice for young men, best alike in being one of the shortest and most judicious as well as most suggestive and earnest, is the Paths of Duty [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 35 cents], by Dean Farrar. The book is delightful reading, apart from its aim and intensity of purpose, and helpfully impressive, apart from its style. Substance and form combine to render it conspicuous among books of its sort.——John Keble's famous The Christian Year [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.50] is a pretty volume, with red letter headings and a few illustrative designs. It is one of the standard works which the Christian public demands from year to year with ever increasing earnestness.——D. L. Pierson has selected and Mary A. Lathbury has illustrated The Northfield Year Book [Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.25], in which practical and spiritual utterances by a large number of eminent Christian men have been brought together, and the book is full of the atmosphere of the gospel, which Mr. Moody himself so well illustrates and so earnestly commends.

The International Sunday school lessons for 1897 are in the Acts and Epistles. First among the helps to the study of these lessons is Peloubet's Select Notes [W. A. Wilde & Co. $1.25]. This twenty-third volume gives us a chronology of the Acts, an excellent list of histories, commentaries and biographical writings on the subject, together with the discriminating selections from many authors which have made Dr. Peloubet's previous volumes so popular. On the whole, we prefer this to any other single work on the Sunday school lessons. ——Illustrative Notes [Eaton & Mains. $1.25] is another volume prepared with the same general plan as the one above described. Its authors are Dr. J. L. Hurlbut and Rev. R. R. Doherty. It contains not only exegetical comments and homiletical suggestions, but abundant illustrative selections from many authors.——The People's Commentary on the Acts [American Sunday School Union. $1.25], by Edwin W. Rice, D. D., follows previous volumes on the four gospels by the same author. He has availed himself of the latest researches and studies, which shed new light on the history of the apostolic church, and at the same time he maintains the conservative position concerning the authorship, authenticity and unity of the book of Acts. Dr. Rice has well combined the older method of explaining the book verse by verse with the discussion of topics and the treatment of the book as a history. All the three volumes above mentioned are generously illustrated with reproductions of photographs and sketches and with excellent maps.

POETRY.

Judith and Holofernes [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25] is by Mr. T. B. Aldrich and it is a careful and thoughtful piece of work, which, nevertheless, does not lack at all the evidence of spontaneity and enthusiasm on the part of the author. Its distinguishing characteristic, as compared with other versions of the story which is its subject, is the portrayal of the heroine less as an embodiment of stern national pride and more as a warm-hearted and deeply feeling woman. A portion of the poem is drawn from an earlier poem by the author. It is a good example of his more serious work.

The contents of Ballads of New Jersey in the Revolution [Jerseyman Print. $1.50], by Charles D. Platt, are well suggested by the title. The author has described the various scenes and events in Revolutionary history connected with the soil of New Jersey in a variety of metrical forms, and with general success in catching the motive and spirit of the ballad. It is poetry which will appeal to the popular ear successfully, and its historical instructiveness is a conspicuous feature. A few illustrations are furnished and some notes and historical tables. It is a collection of poems which ought to aid young people to become agreeably familiar with the history of the Revolution in New Jersey.

Another book of historical poetry is The March to the Sea [Arena Publishing Co. $1.25], by Maj. S. H. M. Byers. It is fairly good poetry, so far as concerns form, and much more than this in the spirit and sustained energy which characterize it. In the future the famous march to the sea is likely to be ranked more highly as a feature of the great conflict than it is even now, and so picturesque an account of it as this will never fail to find readers.

A Quiet Road [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.00], by Lizette W. Reese, is a collection of verse the spirit of which attracts and almost fascinates the reader. But the form is not always as nearly perfect as the spirit. All the poems are short, and they all are suggestive. Unusual descriptive power is apparent. They bear re-reading and set one to thinking, and many of them are fragrant with the scent of the woods, the fields and the streams. They deserve a high place among modern publications of their kind.

Messrs. T. Y. Crowell & Co. have issued a new edition of the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayám and the Salámán and Absál of Jámí [$1.00], ably prepared by Mr. N. H. Dole. It is Edward Fitzgerald's rendering, and the volume also contains a biographical sketch of Fitzgerald, Tennyson's epilogue to him, Fitzgerald's own account of Omar and several other important features. This is said to be the only extant edition in which Jámi's allegory is contained in Fitzgerald's translation. The Rubáiyát never will be a popular poem, but the admiration which many of the best judges express for it secures it a permanent place in literature, and this edition, rendered additionally attractive by the addition of Jámi's allegory, will undoubtedly meet a real demand. It has been issued in a very tasteful form, and a portrait of Fitzgerald forms the frontispiece.

Messrs. T. Y. Crowell & Co. also have issued a very choice, select edition in two volumes of the poems of Robert Browning [$3.00]. The selection was made by Browning himself. The edition is from the author's revised text of 1889, and additions from his later works are included. It has been edited by Charlotte Porter and Helen A. Clarke, and has biographical and critical notes and introduction. It would be difficult to prepare a more satisfactory edition for the great public to which Browning makes a permanent appeal.

The seventh volume of William Knight's edition of the Poetical Works of William Wordsworth [Macmillan Co. $1.50] is out, and its features, of course, are similar to those of the earlier volumes. It includes the Ecclesiastical Sonnets and many miscellaneous poems.——Through Love to Light [Joseph Knight Co. $1.25] is a collection of "songs of good courage," by J. H. and Annie H. Chadwick. They have gleaned skillfully from a wide range of sources, and the book alike in substance, spirit and appearance will be a helpful visitor in many families.——Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece [Macmillan Co. Each 45 cents] are two more issues in the delightful little series known as the Temple Shakespeare, which we often have described before.

STORIES.

Quo Vadis [Little, Brown & Co. $2.00], by Henry Sienkiewicz, translated by Jeremiah Curtin, a narrative of the time of Nero, introduces the reader to a very different period from that with which the author's name has been identified hitherto. But he reveals himself a master in authorship as truly in describing ancient Rome as in picturing the struggles of Poland. The strangely confused and contrasted types of life in Rome at the time considered are represented with a minute and even thrilling fidelity not often equaled. The reckless luxury and extravagance of the nobles, the desperate poverty of the lower classes, the paganism of everybody except the Christians, and their consecration, even in the face of terrible persecutions, and especially their final sufferings before the tyrant Nero lost his throne and his life—all these are set forth with the skill of a master who also possesses as profound a human sympathy as if he had been an actor in the scenes he describes. The author has devoted special attention to the character of Nero himself, and nowhere in literature has the gradual development of the debased emperor's vanity, superstition, sensuality and insatiable cruelty been more shrewdly portrayed. In fact, the evidences of most thorough study are discernible on every page. The story is very long, but it is saturated with the atmosphere of its period, and it offers a succession of pictures which, in spite of the painfulness of some of them, are of great historical importance. They also are striking testimonials to the genuineness and victoriousness of the piety of the Roman Christians.

Mr. Haggard has opened what for him is a somewhat new vein in The Wizard [Longmans, Green & Co. $1.25], for he has described the wonderful experiences of a missionary whose consecrated faith and self-sacrifice took him into interior Africa to a tribe believed to be unapproachable by missionary effort. In his own striking style and making every use of his intimate knowledge of Africa and its people, and with something even of the sensationalism of his earlier books, Mr. Haggard has written a story which is a beautiful tribute to the fidelity and simple faith of the missionary and to the success of his policy, or lack of policy, in the most adverse circumstances. The book is of much interest, and, in spite of some gory pages, its general tone is elevated, and it even might be put into Sunday school libraries.

A Knight of the Nets [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], by Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, makes the reader acquainted with life among the fishing people along the Scotch coast, and brings out clearly their strong points and their weaknesses. Their native dignity and manliness are shown attractively and the principal criticism which the reader finds himself compelled to make is that such fiendish cruelty as that which the mother-in-law shows to her son's wife is almost inconceivable. In dealing with the higher classes the book is less successful than in picturing the fisher folk, but it is a strong and a noble book throughout.

Limitations [Harper & Bros. $1.25] is by E. F. Benson, son of the late Archbishop of Canterbury. The author's purpose seems to be to indicate the familiar truth that our mental, spiritual or social limitations frequently prevent us from becoming what we have hoped to be. It contains bright scenes and many fresh and striking passages, but on the whole is somewhat depressing and tends toward pessimism rather than optimism. Its last half subtracts from the interest of the first half, but perhaps that is true of many human lives. The author has literary ingenuity certainly, and the story is far superior to his first novel, but, although entertaining, it is not a book which suggests the highest ideal as animating him.

The Metropolitans [Century Co. $1.25], by Jeanie Drake, is a New York society story for the most part, in which some unconventional features supply fresh interest, and which is spiritedly written throughout, and is entertaining in spite of a certain superficial tone which pervades much of it. Some of the minor characters are more forceful than their principals, and the outcome of the story will be thought inartistic by many. But the book will be popular for its vivacity of both substance and style.

Captain Charles King's latest story, A Tame Surrender [J. B. Lippincott Co. 75 cents], deals with the Chicago riot. It is a vivid picture of that famous episode and a pleasant love story blends with the historical narrative. It is a volume of the Lotos Library, and in size and form it is especially well adapted for reading during travel.

For Freedom's Sake [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25], by Arthur Paterson, is a historical novel describing towns and people in the Kansas of 1856. The author's admiration for John Brown must have been one of the moving impulses impelling him to write the book, and it puts the picturesque and heroic old leader conspicuously before the reader It appears to give a very faithful picture of the turbulent conditions of things at that time and it describes the progress of events until quiet reigned in Kansas and the hero and heroine had attained peace after peril. ——Captain Shannon [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], by Coulson Kernahan, is a detective story in which a self-appointed detective runs down a dynamiter in England, at last successfully. The interplay of shrewdness and plotting and their successful blinding and detecting of one another supply amusing reading, even if one find it easier to pass some features by without too critical an examination than to assure himself of their possibility.——George Sand's The Devil's Pool [Little, Brown & Co. $1.25], translated by Jane M. Sedgwick and Ellery Sedgwick, is out in a pretty edition. It is a simple and unpretending story of peasant life in France, and the author illustrates her pre-eminent ability by the skill with which she brings out the striking and touching beauties of common life and envelops it in the atmosphere of tenderness and interest. This is a pleasant rendering of an agreeable book.

In The Fearsome Island [H. S. Stone & Co.], by Albert Kinross, an alleged narrative of a sea voyage of some four hundred years ago is put into modern English, the adventures of the narrator being many and fearful. The book is striking in its way, but by no means the equal of many other books of travel and adventure.——North Cornwall is the scene of The Mist on the Moors [R. F. Fenno & Co. 75 cents], by Joseph Hocking. The author describes the abduction of a young lady and her rescue and restoration to her friends by a gallant young farmer, with whom she promptly and properly falls in love. This by no means thrilling outline is filled in with more or less in the way of descriptions of persons and scenery and examples of Cornish dialect. It is an agreeable little book, without being in any way notable.——Amy E. Blanchard's Betty of Wye [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25] takes one back to the Virginia of some time past, and is a study of life in that part of the South alike in country and in town. It also describes the development of character of the heroine, who is by no means free from faults, but who wins one's regard as one goes on with her story. The book entertains to its very close, and does more than merely entertain.——The Golden Fleece [J. B. Lippincott Co. 75 cents] is another story by Julian Hawthorne. It is a sketch of life, love and mystery in New Mexico or southern California, and the author blends a sort of spiritualism with the other elements of his story in a daring but not very convincing or attractive manner.

The Mystery of the Island [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25], by Henry Kingsley, is out in a new edition. It is a South American story, and decidedly improbable, yet not more so than many other stories of the sort. Without ranking among the best of its class it is readable and sometimes amusing.

The late Robert Louis Stevenson's book of Fables [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00], contains a score of little sketches in the fable form, which hardly can be said to represent him at his best. Probably they were not intended to be published without further labor on his part. Yet no friend of his need regret to see them before the public, and in their own peculiar manner they will help to keep his memory green.

JUVENILE.

Mrs. C. D. Jamison, whose earlier stories have won a wide and well-deserved popularity, is the author of Seraph, the Little Violinist [W. A. Wilde & Co. $1.50]. Her little heroine has a remarkable talent for music, especially as produced by the violin, and the author's remarkable power of felicitous and picturesque description of child life is here illustrated afresh with exceptional success. It is a sweet little story which not only the children but their elders will thoroughly enjoy.——A new number is out in The War of the Revolution series, by E. T. Tomlinson. It is Three Young Continentals [W. A. Wilde & Co. $1.50], and is a sequel to his Three Colonial Boys. In the same animated and sufficiently scholarly manner it describes the course of events previous to the battle of Long Island and represents its three heroes as active in patriotic fashion, and it is full of incident and instruction. It will entertain the boys while it also promotes intelligent patriotism.

Mr. George Manville Fenn has taken this year a tin mine on the coast of Cornwall as the scene of his usual book for boys. It is called Beneath the Sea [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1 50]. It is in his customary bright and entertaining style and its lessons of self-reliant manliness are more likely to be remembered because they are suggested rather than taught directly. It is worthy of the author's previous work.

William Drysdale, the author of The Fast Mail [W. A. Wilde & Co. $1 50], has taken for his theme the history of a train boy, and his brisk and telling style makes the more interesting the facts of a somewhat picturesque young life. The story inculcates energy, fidelity to duty and uprightness and the boys will like it.——Around the Camp Fire [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50] is by Prof. C. G. D. Roberts. It is a hunting story and reports the stories which a company of sportsmen narrated to each other evening by evening in camp during a canoeing trip in the New Brunswick wilderness. It is exciting and even sensational, but not unwholesome. Those who are familiar with the life of the woods will enjoy it especially, but all the boys will relish it.——The Oracle of Baal [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.50], by J. P. Webster, is an imaginary story of exploration and conflict in Africa which if not prompted to some extent by the reading of Mr. Haggard's stories follows closely in the same line. It is more than ordinarily interesting and, although somewhat bloody, it is promotive of manliness. Among the current tales of travel and adventure it certainly deserves favorable mention.

Three Little Daughters of the Revolution [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 75 cents] is by Nora Perry, and contains three little sketches about young girls, their doings a hundred years and more ago. It is bright and amusing and its historical suggestions are useful.——The Making of a Hero and Other Stories [Fleming H. Revell Co. 50 cents], by Mrs. George A. Paull, contains half a dozen little sketches for boys which are short, vigorous and commendably suggestive of what the boys ought to be and to do.——To Tell the King the Sky Is Falling [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75], by Sheila E. Braine, is the somewhat fanciful title of small collection of fairy stories familiar to many, and gracefully retold and expanded and illustrated lavishly and aptly. It is intended for the younger children and they will delight in it.——Little Men and Maids [F. A. Stokes Co. $1.25] contains stories and verses by Elizabeth S. Tucker with decorative page borders and with a number of full page color plates by Frances Brundage. It is a book which catches the eye and invites examination and which by the daintiness and artistic skill of its adornment and by the simplicity and brightness of its text makes an effective appeal for popularity.

Many of the best of the Household Stories of the Brothers Grimm [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 75 cents] have been translated by Lucy Crane and illustrated by Walter Crane, and published in a small but handsomely printed book, which the children will enjoy reading. The translation is exceptionally good, and even the great popularity which the stories already possess will be increased as they are here read.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Lockhart's famous Life of Sir Walter Scott [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $3 00] has been reissued in a very substantial and handsome two volume edition, which is a reproduction—the first American—of the abridged edition of 1871. Although abridged, the edition is abundantly inclusive, and it places within American popular reach a work which has hitherto been far too largely confined in its circulation to the libraries of the more wealthy.

In view of the recent death of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, the reissue of her writings is very timely. Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have brought out in their beautiful Riverside edition her Uncle Tom's Cabin [$1.50], with an introductory history and a key to the work, and also a volume of Household Papers and Stories [$1 50], each of which will find new readers and will be welcomed with widespread and unabated interest. We believe it to be the fact that no writer of the century has been more widely read than Mrs. Stowe, and the book on which her fame chiefly has rested, and which became known far more extensively than anything else from her pen, is, of course, her Uncle Tom's Cabin.

NOTES.

—— The late Dr. Benson, Archbishop of Canterbury, had in press when he died a volume on St. Cyprian which soon will be out.

—— A considerable number of forged autographs of Martin Luther recently have been put on the market in Germany, and the forger, who has shown some adroitness except in overdoing his game, has been arrested.

—— The London Academy is about to abandon its ancient traditions by printing small cuts in its text. It has just changed owners and Mr. Lewis Hind, formerly editor of the Pall Mall Budget, is to become its editor.

—— They tell large tales of the offers made to Dr. Nansen, the Arctic explorer, for his forthcoming narrative of his trip. One publisher is said to have offered him $50,000 outright, another $30,000 in advance payment of future royalties!

—— Mr. Paul Laurence Dunbar, a young colored man, has a volume of poems in press of Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co., called Lyrics of Lowly Life. He is the son of two former slaves and has been an elevator boy in Dayton, O. He is said to possess a striking poetical talent.

—— The notice of Dr. E. H. Byington's excellent book, which Book News quotes from the Philadelphia Telegraph, contains many blunders for so short an utterance. Dr. Byington must not be held responsible for them. For example, instead of all coming from Holland many Pilgrims came from England without having been in Holland at all, and all, or nearly all, came from England primarily. They did not refuse allegiance to the English king but loyally rendered it. Plymouth colony was not independent politically or commercially. The Puritans discarded the English Church at once and set up Congregational churches.

Here are a few extracts from letters accompanying gifts:

When I read your notice of its urgent need I said to each one of my three children, "I will give you one week each to earn a dollar toward this fund," and laid out the task which I hope each will perform. It seems to me there should be a special and a grand response from the children. If the children of every family that takes The Congregationalist will work for $1.00 each and collect additional if possible it would roll up to quite a volume.

This, my mite, I hasten to send, for having lived some years in the far East I have a keen realization of the almost hopelessly sad life before these children unless they come at once under the protection of our missionaries.

Though I passed the Scriptural age of "threescore and ten years" four years ago, yet I am glad that my "natural force is unabated." I trust your appeal will be promptly and generously responded to.

Deaths.

The charge for notices of deaths is twenty-five cents. Each additional line ten cents, counting eight words to a line. The money should be sent with the notice.

CARLETON, In Lowell, Nov. 6, of pneumonia, Mrs Sarah Carleton, aged 84 yrs., 5 mos.

DANA—In Kansas City, Mo., Nov. 10, Miss Arvilla Sinclair Dana, aged 70 yrs., widow of Charles S. Dana, formerly of St. Johnsbury and Montpelier, Vt.

HERRICK—In Castleton, Vt., Nov. 9, Rev. William T. Herrick, aged 78 yrs. He was a graduate of the University of Vermont in 1839, and held pastorates in Vermont and New York States. He has resided in Castleton since 1889.

SARAH WEBSTER HEARD,

Who recently died of pneumonia at her home in Wayland, was a person of lovely presence, of sweet and pure spirit and much nobility of character. She was a graduate of Smith College in the Class of 1881, and afterwards taught in Lexington, Boston and Springfield, and had just entered upon her sixth year in the Weston High School with fresh interest and bright prospects. As a teacher she was faithful, earnest and progressive, keeping in touch with new methods and knowledge by constant reading, and planning for herself in another year a continued course of study abroad.

By her accurate scholarship, her personal refinement and high character she won the respect and esteem of her pupils. Modest and retiring almost to a fault, only those who knew her best understood the individuality with which she chose her own standards of thinking and living, and the loving heart which made her death an irreparable loss to her nearest friends. "It is easily the very best magazine of its class published on either continent."

ST. NICHOLAS

FOR YOUNG FOLKS

CONDUCTED BY MARY MAPES DODGE.

"THE best of all children's magazines" is the universal verdict on St. Nicholas. It began existence in 1873, and since that time has gradually merged in itself all of the leading children's magazines in America. The supreme quality of St. Nicholas is its bright, healthful, and invigorating atmosphere.

THE COMING YEAR will be a great one in its history. It will have a more varied table of contents and more spirited illustrations than ever before. The leading serial, beginning in November, is

A Story of the Time of Shakspere:

"MASTER SKYLARK," BY JOHN BENNETT. ILLUSTRATED BY BIRCH.

THIS is a live story, full of action, color, merriment, and human nature. The world's greatest poet figures as one of the principal characters, although the hero and heroine are a boy and girl. It is poetic in treatment, but full of the romance of the Elizabethan age, and very dramatic in plot. Another serial, beginning in November, is

A Great War Story for North and South.

"THE LAST THREE SOLDIERS," BY WILLIAM H. SHELTON.

A STRONG story with a unique plot. Three Union soldiers, members of a signal corps, stationed on a mountain-top, cut a bridge that connects them with the rest of the world and become veritable castaways in the midst of the Confederacy. Will be read with delight by all children.

THERE are other serial stories, special illustrated articles on timely topics, and contributions from

All the best writers.

Patriotic Sketches, Historical Stories, Spirited Pictures, Tales of Travel, Helpful Articles, Fanciful Tales, Prize Puzzles, Bright Poems.

PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON An Autobiography (1834–1858), and a Memoir by his wife (1858–1894), with a portrait. Demy 8vo, cloth, $3.00.

Ten years before his death Hamerton began an autobiography, at which he worked intermittently, only living to carry it as far as his twenty-fourth year. But this was the year of his marriage, and Mrs. Hamerton has therefore been able to carry on the narrative with intimate knowledge of all she relates. The volume contains many of Hamerton's letters, and others of the greatest interest from Robert Browning, G. F. Watts, Peter Graham and R. L. Stevenson.

LEAVES FROM JULIANA HORATIA EWING'S "CANADA HOME." Gathered by ELIZABETH S. TUCKER. With illustrations by the author, and facsimiles of Mrs. Ewing's color sketches made while at Frederickton. Quarto, cloth, $3.00.

The volume will contain a number of letters from Mrs. Ewing, written in this country to friends in England, never before published.

These are a few memories and facts of that portion of her life spent on this side of the Atlantic—a sort of gleaner's sheaf from the rich field of that life already gone over and scored by her sister, Miss H. K. Gatty, who, however, in her interesting work has left almost untouched the record of the two years in Canada.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, NOV. 13.

Mrs. Capron, always a welcome leader, presided and brought helpful suggestions to more than a hundred who had gathered in Pilgrim Hall. She spoke of revelation as sometimes made by way of contrast, and, reading the latter part of Heb. 12, beginning, "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness, and darkness, and tempest," showed first the dark side of the contrast, and the sevenfold glory of the other side. Special emphasis was placed upon the words, "Ye are come."

Mrs. Wolcott Calkins quoted the passage, "I know that my judgments are just, because I do the will of my Father which is in heaven," with the thought that doing God's will should be the measure of our own judgments. Mrs. Capron spoke of the swift flight of thought from one part of the world to another and of the vivid pictures which are thus easily brought before the mind's eye. She had that morning received three letters from India written in the Tamil tongue—not from her Bible women but from other Christian women whom she had not seen for many years, and who wished to send messages to her. She also alluded to a registered letter which came to her from a Tamil woman. Wondering why it was registered, since there seemed no reason, she sent her query to India, and the answer came back, "Because I loved you so much that I wanted to put all the money I could upon the letter."

Miss Child spoke for the missionaries in Japan whose names were upon the calendar during the week, and of two large gatherings of Japanese women which she attended, one of which was to celebrate the birthday of the empress, when there were seven or eight hundred present under the auspices of Christian women. Miss Colby gave some account of the girls' school at Osaka, a city as large as Boston, speaking also of the new openings for evangelistic work.

Miss Caldwell delivered a message from a lady of eighty-three who lives among the Berkshire hills: "Please tell the dear ladies who meet for Friday prayer meeting that I almost always think of them, and my heart is with them and my desires go out for a blessing upon them and upon the cause for which they pray." It was a great pleasure to have the presence of Miss Myra Proctor, for many years at the head of the Aintab girls' school. She mentioned two facts which especially interest her in connection with affairs in Turkey—one, that where persecution has been sharpest there has been the greatest religious interest; the other, the great value of the educational work.

Reminiscences and Impressions of Dr. Quint.

As Recorded by Several Who Knew Him Intimately.

A MIGHTY COUNSELOR.

A. H. Q.

BY GEORGE P. MORRIS.

For, behold, the Lord, the Lord of Hosts, doth take away from Jerusalem and from Judah stay and staff . . . the mighty man . . . the counselor.—Isa. 3: 1-3.

Freely he gave of that which money could not buy
Or aught but age and wisdom proffer.
Men took; God's vineyard blossomed.
But when he gave did all who took
Give thanks, as meet and proper?

Too often thus we overlook or underrate
The blessing close at hand.
Alas, that only when the voice is stilled,
Too late, we see and wholly understand.

If often caution seemed to rule,
When impulse swayed the crowd,
It was because he felt that haste were waste,
And silent shaping of events worth more Than breathings loud.

'Twas his to weigh, to sift,
And not to act as whip and spur.
Prophet he was not; neither priest,
But guardian and arbiter
Of Pilgrim polity and law.

I suppose many of Dr. Quint's friends, who heard him talk on the political issues of the recent campaign, if they judged him only by his casual and somewhat enigmatical remarks, may have been surprised and grieved, for he was more critical of the Republican party and less loyal to the gold standard than most of his fellow Eastern clergymen. He did not intend to journey to New Hampshire to vote, for I do not think he felt able to, nor could he have decided easily what to do if he had gone to the polls. "Why?" it may be asked. Perhaps I may answer, for it happens that in the next to the last conversation I had with him he opened his heart on this subject in a way that was unusual and impressive. It was the message, as I felt at the time, of one who was soon to pass away given to one whom he thought might live to see a new century, full of surprising political and social changes.

He told me in this talk that his assent to much that was set forth in the Chicago platform was based on convictions that were as deep rooted as his religious convictions. He believed that Mr. McKinley would be elected, though not by a large majority in the electoral college, or a large plurality in the popular vote, but he foresaw a day soon when the issue between plutocracy and democracy would be joined, and while I do not think he had much, if any, confidence in the present leaders of the army of dissent, such men as Messrs. Bryan and Altgeld, neither had he much greater faith in the Republican leaders or that they would be able to satisfy the people or long postpone the greater conflict.

No one could talk much with Dr. Quint, especially on political themes, without finding out how anti-English he was in his sympathies. None knew better than he the beneficent effects of British rule, or how much we and the English have in common, and he would frankly confess this when engaged in debate. But the stories of the sufferings of his ancestors in the Revolution which he had heard from his sire and grandsire had burned their way into his soul, and his own recollections of British sympathy and material aid given to rebels against the flag which he loved were such that he, being human, found it difficult to forget as well as forgive.

I wish I could have witnessed that scene in the National Council of 1865, after Dr. Leonard Bacon had brought in the report of the committee charged with answering the salutations brought to the council by foreign delegates. This report, signed by Dr. Bacon, Henry Ward Beecher, J. M. Sturtevant, Rufus Anderson and J. B. Walker, had frankly told the delegates from Great Britain that American Congregationalists could not forget that "the dominant influences in the Congregational Union and the ostensible organs of Congregational opinion in England were against us in our fight with secession and slavery." Chaplain Quint was on his feet in an instant moving the acceptance and adoption of the report. For days he had weighing upon him the dread that the council would forget in its personal liking for Rev. Dr. R. Vaughan, one of the British delegates, and its desire for amity, that he was the editor of the British Quarterly and responsible for its cruel slurs upon republican institutions and the sincerity of purpose of the North. But this report, to his delight, rang true. It inspired his courage and recalled his deep seated distrust of Great Britain, and he proceeded to beard the British lion in his den (Dr. Vaughan sat on the platform and afterward replied to Chaplain Quint). The student of our national and denominational history, or one simply seeking a racy bit of controversial literature, will find much in the record of this episode to repay his search. Rev. Dr. J. P. Thompson of New York tried to pour oil on the troubled waters. Rev. Dr. Vaughan in a manly, spirited speech tried to set himself and his British brethren right. Henry Ward Beecher, fresh from his conflict with British mobs, palliated but did not justify the British Congregationalists' lack of sympathy, and before he had finished he and Dr. Vaughan had shaken hands as a token of entire reconciliation.

Dartmouth College, his alma mater, will miss Dr. Quint. During recent years I fancy his joys coming from Dartmouth have been quite as deep as any he has had outside his family. His daughter's pioneer work in securing admission to post-graduate study there, and her standing as a scholar and her popularity gave him keenest delight. President Tucker had no more loyal friend and discriminating admirer than Dr. Quint, and he will be interested to know that about the last words that I heard fall from Dr. Quint's lips were such words of praise and respect for Dr. Tucker as come to few men in the course of life, however strenuous and noble it may be.

I confess frankly that my earliest impressions of Dr. Quint were not such as to win my enthusiastic admiration. But in time I came to see that I had done him injustice, and that he filled a niche that was his own, that no other man could fill. I came to see that, to quote his own words, "the world is greatly governed by the balance of opposites," and that we need just such men as he. I came to see that he was not so much an opportunist as a meliorist. Nor was the change of opinion due at all to the fact that I had come to have affection for one whose daily visits have been profitable and delightful in more ways than can be described here.

A SERVANT OF MANY.

It is impossible to separate in thought Dr. Quint from his close friends, Drs. H. M. Dexter and A. L. Stone, a trio bound by common interests, common purpose and common faith, as well as by personal affinity, and sharing each other's entire confidence as to things material and things spiritual. How vividly rise the pictures of the three in the Park Street or the Pine Street Church study, The Congregationalist's office or around the table of the Winthrop Club, comparing each other's inmost experiences, interchanging opinions on the "burning questions" of the day, planning for the advancement of this journal—their favorite child—of the principles and churches of the Pilgrims, and of Christ's kingdom at large. Godly men they were, yet from time to time they lighted up the serious business of the hour with those facetious sallies which their associates well remember as prominently characteristic of them all.

From that immediate circle of attached brethren how many have left us: besides those already named, John O. and James H. Means, Noyes, Manning, Alden—not to lengthen here the honored list. What a wealth of helpful influence ceased from earth as each of these took his heavenward way. Honorable is the record each has left; but who of them all will be more gratefully remembered, or for better reason, than he, their latest follower? The parishes he served well in Jamaica Plain, New Bedford, Somerville, and others to which he gave more temporary ministry; our country, that profited by his three years' faithful chaplaincy of "the Second Massachusetts"; the survivors of that gallant regiment; his native State, whose legislature felt the force of his sagacity in the shaping of her laws; our denomination, to the exposition, defense and spreading of whose doctrines and practice he gave many years of profound study—the fruits of which abound in the volumes of the Congregational Quarterly, the records of the National Council, and the columns of The Congregationalist—all these are his debtors.

None more truly so than this paper, to whose columns he has been from his earliest public life a valued contributor, and which in these later years he has enriched with articles rarely equaled in value since the pen of Professor Phelps dropped from his dying hand. Thousands have profited by the ripened spiritual wisdom, blended with sterling sense, most felicitously expressed, that has marked his later writings.

What he was to the inner circle of his older personal Christian friends only themselves can know. Honest, frank, generous, tender, true, devout—the world has too few of these, and when they leave us, how great is the void in our lives. Nothing can fill it but the sunny memory of their love and the assurance that the parting is but brief. Even Plato said, more than two thousand years ago, "True friendship"—could he have foreseen that all "true" friendship is Christian?—"between man and man is infinite and immortal." Or, as a modern writer gives it, "A true friend is a friend forever."

Ah, how good it feels!
The hand of an old friend.

Yes, Mr. Longfellow, but we can drop even that without a tear when assured that we shall soon grasp it again—forever.

HUNTINGTON.

THE WORD OF AN OLD-TIME FRIEND.

I became acquainted with Dr. Quint long before I ever saw him. Perhaps because the most of his letters from the army might have been written in the saddle, or by the light of an army candle, they were at times scarcely legible, and the letters were turned over to me for deciphering, very much to my joy and pleasure. The man was a hero in my eyes. Afterwards, when I became personally known to him, the ideal was never lowered. In these later years, when I knew him more intimately, his cheery salutation, "Hullo, T. T.," was a very pleasant sound in my ears. Like many another person who has had sad experience in the management of church affairs, we talked together often, and what lingers in my mind more than anything else was the undivided attention which he gave to the matter in hand, as though it were the only trouble that he had ever heard of, and the conviction that it was his duty to give advice which would set that matter right, if nothing else were ever done. With hundreds and thousands of others, I can but voice the general sense of loss at his parting from us.

T. T.

DR. QUINT DAY BY DAY.

What rich material for an Ian Maclaren Dr. Quint's personality would have furnished. There was something so immediately striking, so distinctive about him that even casual contact made you aware that he was not run in the ordinary mold. He was not a typical man in the sense that there ever was or ever will be any one at all like him. Other stars will appear on our firmament, but the light which was quenched when his star set will not be kindled again here. We cannot duplicate that fund of knowledge, that poise of judgment, that penetration to the heart of the matter, that astute understanding of human nature and particularly of Christian human nature, that shrewd and genial philosophy of life, any more than we can bring back to our longing eyes that compact, soldierly frame and that face all of whose features were not infrequently impressed into service when he would give vent to his feeling.

It was, however, a face which I had to learn to like when I first began to know it ten years ago. His manner seemed brusque and I fancied he might be, if occasion offered, arbitrary and perhaps dictatorial. I always suspected when he walked into Dr. Dexter's inner sanctum that some heresy case was brewing and that if there were any hammering of heretics to be done in the denomination Dr. Quint would be just the man to wield the bludgeon. But I very soon learned that neither he nor our beloved and still lamented chief had any ambition to become Congregagational popes, that they cared only for reasonable adherence to accredited standards and customs, that they desired to have the life of the denomination move on in orderly ways preserving what is best in its traditions and bearing new fruit constantly. Whatever may have been thought at certain periods of their life, of Dr. Dexter and Dr. Quint, they were always at heart progressive and irenic men.

My change of feeling toward Dr. Quint tallies with what I have heard others express, and it is pleasant to think that in the later years of his life at least he came to be better understood and more highly valued by the denomination at large. It bestowed upon him, four years ago, the highest honor in its possession, the moderatorship of the National Council, and learned to look to him at all times for guidance through debatable territory. He in turn broadened and mellowed in proportion as he was trusted and loved and he repaid the confidence reposed in him by putting his best thought and ripest wisdom at the disposal of all who needed counsel and sympathy.

What Lambeth Palace is to the Archbishop of Canterbury the Congregational House was to Dr. Quint. No clubman was ever fonder of the walls and furnishings of his place of daily resort than was Dr. Quint of the old weather-beaten and decaying structure where the interests of the denomination have centered for nearly twenty-five years, but from which a kind Providence seems to be providing exit before long. After toiling up Beacon Street Dr. Quint would avail himself of the help of the elevator to reach the library floor. Once within that circular building in whose alcoves are gathered the literary treasures of the denomination, many of which he had helped to assemble, he was on his native heath, ecclesiastically speaking. But it would be a mistake to suppose that he cared only for the atmosphere of high thinking and abstract culture which is discernible there. He liked the library because of its regular force of workers, all of whom became his close friends and willing servants. He liked it also because people came and went there whom he enjoyed seeing. The salutation, the chat, the banter of the moment were congenial. He relished the give and take of free and familiar speech. He wanted to know the news, and he usually had news to communicate which was generally spiced with some pithy, amusing comment. I think now and then, like the rest of us, he dallied with a bit of ecclesiastical gossip and found it relishable. Yet Dr. Quint was pretty scrupulous in his impartation of information. You never felt quite sure that he had told you all he knew. He buttoned up within his tight-fitting coat more inside knowledge of our benevolent societies and of our churches and ministers than any one else possessed, and for the most part he kept it buttoned up.

It was in the library that he usually met by appointment the men who wanted to see him about this or that knotty question. I have seen him scores of times in one of the alcoves face to face with one or more persons, "both hearing them and asking them questions." It was his way to let the complainant do most of the talking—a thing which I have generally noticed complainants are ready to do. Dr. Quint would sit patient, immobile, unvexed by a long and circumlocutory recital of the situation, withholding comment until he was sure he had the facts all before him. What a variety of matters has thus been brought to his attention! What painful charges of pastoral inefficiency and lay unappreciativeness! What bitter, prolonged rows, ranging in importance from the location of a horse shed to the getting rid of a minister! It is thus that Dr. Quint has woven himself into the history of many a New England church and linked his life with that of many a weary, discouraged ministerial brother. He aimed to be judge rather than partisan, and I have known cases where the advocates of one side of a quarrel, after conferring with him, would meet face to face on their way out their opponents coming to him also for consultation, and he never tried to screen from either party his interest in the other or whatever service he was undertaking to render.

Distasteful as features of this work must have been to Dr. Quint, I think on the whole he delighted in it, and I wonder a little how he adjusts himself to a society where there are no feuds and no "cases." He was just enough of an ecclesiastic to like to apply that influence which, working through committees and boards, brings at last a desirable result. And though in some cases the outcome might have been reached without any outside manipulation, I think, as a friend said the other day, to have it come in the natural way wouldn't have made Dr. Quint quite so happy. This instinct was perhaps most in evidence at the great national meetings of the denomination, especially during the years of dissension in the American Board. It will be recalled how Dr. Storrs, when elected president of the Board at Springfield in 1887, said he would take the office on condition that his friend Quint would be at hand to guide him. Dr. Storrs had in mind not only Dr. Quint's parliamentary skill but his talent for evoking order out of entanglement, and, in short, for bringing things to pass.

We of The Congregationalist staff have peculiarly fresh and tender memories of Dr. Quint. He was in the office about as often as he was in the building, passing from room to room and from desk to desk, chatting with each of us in turn. He never claimed attention if the pressure of work seemed unusually great or if others had preceded him in calling. We were always the wiser after talking with him. I wish now that I had put on paper many of the things which he said. The personal element in his conversation gave it a peculiarly delightful flavor. If politics was the theme his mind would often go back to his own valiant battles on the floor of the New Hampshire legislature. If churches and ministers were under discussion his retentive memory brought to the fore some eventful council in which he had participated or quoted some appropriate utterance of an old-time divine. So without in any way obtruding his own tastes or boasting of his public service—for he was truly a modest man—Dr. Quint revealed much of his mind and heart to us. Through these familiar everyday talks we gained an idea of his college and seminary days and of his army life. His philosophy of life also made itself known. He knew full well the weaknesses of human nature but he believed that God was taking care of his world. He distrusted politicians and he often said that this nation was saved from going to pieces only by a balance of deviltries between the parties. The lighter side of his nature showed itself to us in these daily calls. We learned of his fondness for Dickens and particularly of his affection for one of Dickens's most characteristic creations, the immortal Sam Weller. A good story was always at his command and he could make it fit the conversation whatever the topic.

And now that he is no longer with us to make the day brighter by his friendly greeting and toil easier by his ready sympathy we try to make more vivid the total impression of his character before the haze of time renders it at all dim. None of the trappings and perquisites of ecclesiastical station were his. The title bishop or archbishop would not become him, but when, a few weeks ago, they buried Dr. Benson in stately Canterbury Cathedral there could have been no more sincere mourning for the dead leader than that which was felt throughout our Congregational fellowship when Dr. Quint was laid to rest in the city of his boyhood. We loved him most because Christ lived in him, because Christ has done much for a nature that needed the discipline of time, the testing on battle-fields and all the privations and afflictions of later years in order to reach its best estate.

APPROVAL OF THE ARMENIAN ORPHANS' FUND.

Your editorial on opening orphanages in Armenia for Armenian orphans is one of the most practical suggestions since the massacres. If those whose sympathies go so strongly towards that unfortunate nation would bring the subject to the attention of the children in the Sunday schools, I have no doubt that their pennies and dimes would be given to support hundreds and thousands of starving and naked orphans. A boy or girl can be fed, clothed, housed and educated for from twenty to thirty dollars per year.

Last winter a friend of mine sent some money to Harpoot to be distributed by a person well known to me. This man, in sending his account, mentioned among many heart-rending spectacles he had witnessed the following case: "As I was on my way to a near village with several loaves of bread to give to the hungry women and children, I noticed, a little way from the road under a tree, a woman and child. I walked towards them and found that the mother was dead, and the little child, hardly more than fifteen or eighteen months old, crawling over the dead body of its mother, trying to get nourishment." How many thousands of such cases now exist it is impossible to say.

I hope and pray that The Congregationalist's plan will be taken up at once by Christians of all denominations, and orphanages be established in every large city and town in Turkey.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

We would like to have a look in upon the festive autumnal decorations at the many harvest concerts now occurring in various places, and hear the praise and thanksgiving exercises which are prepared at the expense of so much care and time. But it is quite impossible to adjust the limitations of space so as to give our readers a satisfactory account of all the descriptive items which the season brings to us each year.

A great opportunity of strengthening each other and the cause in the city is afforded by the fraternal organization which the churches of Concord, N. H., have effected. Why do not strong, live churches feel more responsibility for giving out a portion of their best life and sympathy to their weaker sisters at their doors? Such a practical coming together should not be entirely unknown in so many places. The churches referred to have benefited by such an arrangement for over half a century.

"To every man his work" should be the motto of every church member. It would not always be easy for him, however, to live up to it, and any such incentive as a pastor of New York State has given his people must be a great help to the members and pastor both.

Those Minnesota Endeavorers whose care of the Sunday evening service enables their pastor to do needed out-station work—a service for which they are unfitted—surely are largely responsible for the good accomplished by him.

A helpful and practical method of increasing the interest and instruction at the mid-week meeting is suggested by a New Jersey church.

For a jubilant indorsement of the "free pew" system read an item from Beverly, Mass.

NEW YORK'S NEW CHURCH.

The council held Nov. 9, to recognize the new Manhattan Church and install its pastor, Dr. H. A. Stimson, was a body well pleased with their duties and thoroughly satisfied with what they saw and heard. They found a charming hall, on the corner of Eighty-third Street and the Western Boulevard, supplied with every convenience and of attractive appearance. They found a people filled with a delightful spirit of unity, all members of the family of Aaron and Hur, and all ready to respond with a ringing "aye" to the challenge of Dr. R. R. Meredith: "Are you ready to go to work with this pastor?" They found a pastor, stalwart in form and noble in character, ready, as Dr. Lyman said in his prayer, for "movement, march and ministry."

The council was organized with Dr. Meredith as moderator and Dr. Choate scribe. A full history of the enterprise and of the action of church and corporation in calling Dr. Stimson to the pastorate, together with his letter of acceptance, were read. A few questions called forth a statement as to the personnel of the "council of the church," which consists of the pastor, deacons, clerk, treasurer, three members elected for one year at the annual meeting and a representative from every branch of church work, including the board of trustees. Another question elicited the fact that the members had come from Massachusetts, California, Texas and way stations to plant here a Congregational church. No one questioned the orthodoxy or the credentials of the pastor. The finding of the council was stated by the moderator, and his affectionate words brought to the church and pastor an assurance of Christian sympathy and personal gratification on the part of the council which was deeply appreciated. Of the 120 members of the new church sixty-six were contributed by the Broadway Tabernacle, the rest coming from churches of several denominations, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

At the evening service, following the opening exercises, Dr. R. S. Storrs brought the fellowship of the churches to the new organization. Every heart in the audience thrilled as our Grand Old Man, whom two great cities are delighted to honor, stood before us. He welcomed the church, as Congregationalists sound in the faith, to the work in the city, where ignorance and vice and unbelieving culture have strongholds. He alluded to these closing days of his half-century pastorate, spoke of the four women and one man—all that are left of the 150 members at the beginning—and reminded us that churches live while the members are passing away. His closing words were: "Be ye strong. Deal courageously, and the Lord shall be with the good."

Dr. A. J. Lyman offered the prayer of recognition, Dr. Meredith gave the charge to the people. He impressed the thought that ministers are men, and need the sympathy and help of their people. He said: "I charge you to cordial co-operation with your pastor. Hold up his hands. Help his work by doing your own." "Ward off his anxieties. Suffer no detractions to whisper his good name away." "Have you come to listen with a brain cool and fingers washed clear of the gold dust of the week, with lips warm with prayer for your minister?" "Receive your pastor as sent from God. Receive him as a prophet, and you shall receive a prophet's reward."

Dr. Behrends delivered the charge to the pastor and was followed by Dr. Cobb of the C. C. B. S. in the prayer of installation. Dr. Behrends smilingly requested the pastor to be seated, recalling the circumstances of his own installation, fourteen years ago, when he stood just twenty-seven minutes during the installing prayer. At its close Dr. Taylor rose to deliver the charge to the pastor and, "bending his shaggy head," said graciously, "Sit down!" Dr. Behrends spoke of the minister as a leader of men, whose duty it was to be prepared to lead and teach. He said: "Don't labor only to get men into heaven but strive to get heaven into men." "Have definiteness of aim, concentration of energy, persistence, patience, gentleness and firmness." "Preach the Word." "Shell your kernel at home—do your threshing in private—give the meat to the people." "Your hearers may know more poetry than you do but let none know more of the Bible."

The culminating point of Congregational greeting was reached in the address of Dr. Lyman Abbott, extending the right hand of fellowship. As he and Dr. Stimson stood on the platform and clasped hands it seemed as if the spirituality, the thought and soul of the veteran must send an electric thrill to the heart of the Christian soldier in his prime—so reverent and eager for his work. During the address an involuntary hush fell upon the audience. Rev. Dr. Cobb of the Reformed Church gracefully extended neighborly greetings and Dr. Atterbury of the nearest Presbyterian church offered the closing prayer.

The new church is fairly launched upon the sea of life and labor! May her captain, her officers and her crew be faithful and may the blessing of God be over all! S. K. B.

A MASSACHUSETTS PASTORATE BEGUN.

The First Church, Warren, which recently sacrificed its former pastor, Rev. H. G. Hale, in behalf of the new church at Brookline, has been without a leader but a few months previous to the recent installation of Rev. W. B. Forbush, Nov. 11. The new comer is a native of Vermont, and is a graduate of Dartmouth and of Union Seminary. Previous to his present appointment he has gained experience in mission work in New York city, and during pastorates in East Providence, R. I., and in Yarmouth, N. S. Mr. Forbush has received the degrees of Ph. D., and Lit. D. from prominent educational institutions. At the public service of installation Rev. Alex. McGregor preached from the text, "He sent a man before them."

A NEW MAINE EDIFICE.

Pastor and people rejoiced at the prospects which were materially emphasized, Nov. 8, at the exercises of the laying of the corner stone for the new edifice at Ellsworth Falls. The building will be large enough to accommodate over 600 persons. The dimensions are 40 x 70 feet. The arrangements will be convenient and the effect pretty and artistic. The auditorium will have folding doors, admitting more room when demanded. The pastor will have a small room off from the pulpit. A kitchen is to be provided in the basement. The cost of building and furnishing will be toward $4,500. The house is to stand on an elevation and is the only church edifice in the place. Hitherto the people have worshiped in a hall. The seats are to be free, giving to all the same privilege of worship. At the public exercises prayer was offered by Rev. I. H. W. Wharff of the Methodist church, then followed a statement of the work up to date and prospects of the future. Addresses were given by Mr. Wharff and Rev. D. L. Yale. The pastor, Rev. E. L. Hunt, conducted the later exercises around the stone and offered the closing prayer.

Work, How to Put Young People to Work, Work Among the Boys. A resolution adopted last year, urging a contribution from each member of every church to each of the missionary societies, was thoroughly discussed and readopted.

Kidder Association convened with the Welsh Church at Dawn, Oct. 20, 21. Sermons were by Rev. Messrs. Albert Bushnell, D. D., W. L. Sutherland and J. P. Field. Addresses on home missions and the Sunday school were by the respective superintendents. The general topic, Righteousness Toward God, was considered under the following heads: (a) the Great Need of the World, (b) Its Relation to Sabbath Observance, (c) Fidelity to Missions, (d) Work of the Holy Spirit in Promoting It.

The meeting of Hannibal Association was held at Meadville, Oct. 27, 28. The sermon was by Rev. A. W. Wiggins. Topics were: Righteousness Toward God the Need of the World, Every Pastor His Own Evangelist, Supplemental Bible Study in the Sunday School. Rev. Leroy Warren, D. D., who for 25 years was superintendent of home missions in Michigan, made a most eloquent plea for foreign missions. Home missions and S. S. work were presented by Supts. A. K. Wray and W. L. Sutherland.

CLUBS.

MASS.—Do We Need a Revival of Doctrinal Preaching? was the theme of a well-considered address by Rev. J. W. Buckham at the Essex Club in Salem, Nov. 9. He argued that the day for the teaching of systematic theology in our pulpits is past. The position was quite generally advocated in the discussion.

The Newton Club observed its 10th anniversary Nov. 16. Brief addresses were made by its members, Mr. J. F. C. Hyde representing the founders, Mr. G. M. Fiske, the ex-presidents, Rev. H. J. Patrick, D.D., the Newton pastors of 1886, Rev. E. M. Noyes, the Newton pastors of 1896. The chief addresses were by Rev. H. A. Bridgman, representing the religious press, and Hon. A. H. Wellman, the president of the Boston Club. These dealt largely with the problems to be faced and solved by Congregationalism today in our social and civil life.

IND.—The Indianapolis Club was held Nov. 9, with a large attendance. Prof. W. D. Mackenzie was the guest of the club and gave the principal address on Christianity and National Virtue. Rev. E. D. Curtis, D.D., was chosen president for the coming year.

NEW ENGLAND.

Massachusetts.

HYDE PARK.—Dr. A. W. Archibald has just completed his fourth year as pastor. During the pastorate 259 new members, 140 on confession, have been received, making the present enrollment of the church 704. Over $13,000 have been raised yearly on the average. Moreover a $2,000 debt has been canceled, and $1,000 have been spent in improvements.

WEST MEDWAY.—The meeting house and chapel have been newly roofed and painted inside and out and the grounds laid out tastily. The improvements have cost altogether $1,475. Further, two notes amounting to $750 have been canceled. During the year 50 persons, all but nine on confession, have been received to membership. Rev. J. F. Crosby is pastor.

DEDHAM.—Islington. The church enters upon another year with encouraging prospects. Seven persons were added on confession last year, four being heads of leading families in the parish. The circle of King's Daughters has greatly helped the church. A new house has been built for the pastor, Rev. W. F. Bickford, and his family; it was recently consecrated. A large number were present and brought gold, silver and other gifts to the value of $70.

SALEM.—A "Lord's Day congress," under the auspices of the New England Sabbath Protective League, was held in Tabernacle Church Nov. 11. The attendance was not large. Several addresses of much interest on different phases of the subject were made.

WAKEFIELD.—The church roll is being revised by a committee, with a view to reducing the number of absentees, both resident and non-resident. A covenant meeting and roll-call will be held during December. A special collection, amounting to $115, was taken at the evening service, Nov. 1, for the A. M. A. The ladies gave a successful and unique banquet last week Wednesday evening. About 350 persons were present. One of the ladies acted as toast-mistress and the responses were all given by ladies.

BEVERLY.—Dane Street. Nearly 300 sat down to the annual supper Nov. 12. Full reports were read from all departments, showing good progress. Nearly 40 have been added to the membership, a larger number than for years. The present membership—425—and the benevolences—over $2,600—are the largest in the history of the church, while running expenses have been met with unparalleled ease, thanks to the free pew system.

AMESBURY.—Rev. G. W. Christie of the Union Evangelical Church, with his native Scotch accent and feeling, is delighting church and benevolent circles in this vicinity with readings from The Bonnie Brier Bush.

LOWELL.—Kirk Street. The repairs upon the house of worship are now completed, and the new memorial organ was used for the first time last Sunday. A new pulpit of quartered oak has been presented by one of the church members. A special musical service on Sunday evening was largely attended, and a special feature was the antiphonal service of the choirs in opposite ends of the church. The postponed communion will be held on Sunday next, when 50 new members will be received. The new pastor, Rev. W. A. Bartlett, is already greatly beloved by his people.

DRACUT.—First has expended about $350 in repairs and improvements during the past two months. The congregations have shown a marked increase of late, especially at the evening service, while the S. S. attendance has increased nearly one-half in a few weeks. The pastor, Rev. E. L. Baker, has just concluded a series of morning sermons on The Church in the Community, and has begun an evening series on Christ's Universals, that are attracting much attention. It is expected that the Central Church, which is about to renovate and remodel its house of worship, will worship with us until its building is reopened.

GROTON.—The late Miles Spaulding left, among other bequests, the following, to be paid after the death of his widow or at such previous time as she may appoint: $1,000 to the American Seamen's Friend Society of New York, and $4,000 to the Sunday School Society as a fund. After her death the residue of the estate, outside of a few private bequests, is to be divided equally between the A. M. A., the C. H. M. S. and the A. B. C. F. M.

WORCESTER.—Bethany celebrated the fifth anniversary of its organization, Nov. 12. The Sunday school and cottage meetings were begun about a year before by the veteran missionary, Rev. W. T. Sleeper. The church now has nearly 100 members, a good house of worship and has reached self-support. During the five years it has had three pastorates. The present pastor is Rev. A. G. Todd.——Old South. Dr. A. Z. Conrad entertained 250 men of the congregation at his home, Nov. 12, under the auspices of the men's union. The union now numbers 210, and has planned a series of six public meetings, to be addressed by national leaders on living topics. Congressman Knox and Senator Miller are the speakers for Nov. 23.

DALTON.—First. The recently elected lieutenant-governor, W. M. Crane, is a member of this church, where he has served faithfully in many of its offices. He has also been one of its most generous benefactors. His brother, father and grandfather have all been members of the executive council of the governor.

Maine.

PORTLAND.—Rev. B. F. Mills lectured in City Hall under the auspices of the Young Woman's Christian Association, Nov. 6, on The Milk of Human Kindness. The following Sunday, Nov. 8, he preached to a large congregation in Williston Church, and in the afternoon he pleaded the cause of suffering Armenia in City Hall. A collection of more than $400 was taken. Twenty-five Armenians were on the platform, many of them being refugees from Turkey. Two of them told their pathetic story through an interpreter. Their presence made the occasion most eloquent and impressive. The immense assembly was moved to tears. Homes have been found by the State W. C. T. U. for 23 refugees. They are men of education and ability and some of them before their persecution were wealthy.

ASHLAND.—The building will soon be closed in from the weather. Services are now held in the basement, and after two removals a permanent home for services is welcome. Rev. C. L. Parker and wife are devoted to the work, which now prospers well. The proportion of men and boys at services is encouraging. The S. S. roll of 45, a C. E. Society of 20, the Juniors and Temperance Legion, making a specialty of Christian temperance work, and a branch work at a mill two miles away are among the activities.

New Hampshire

EXETER.—First. Dr. A. L. Merrill, whose family have long been associated with this church, has recently given a large tablet of highly polished black slate which has been inserted into the front of the church edifice, bearing the inscription: "The First Church in Exeter. Founded, 1638. Re-organized, 1698. This house built, 1798." The tablet is fastened at the right of the main entrance by heavy ornamental brass bolts. In this edifice the executive and legislative officers of the State have convened, and on specially important occasions the courts also. In it was celebrated the 200th anniversary of the town, and during the same year Daniel Webster, Edward Everett, Jeremiah Smith, J. P. Hale, J. G. Palfrey, Caleb Cushing and other dignitaries there paid their tribute of respect to Dr. Abbott, for many years principal of the academy. Its pulpit has been filled with men of eminence. Rev. W. L. Anderson, the pastor, recently preached an appropriate sermon on The Foundation of the Christian Church, in the course of which he alluded to the memorial with the appreciative thanks of all.

CONCORD.—West. The 54th annual meeting of the five Congregational churches of the city was held Nov. 12, with a large attendance, evincing the strong hold the customary gathering has upon the hearts of the people. Besides the social and prandial features of the occasion, Rev. Cyrus Richardson, D. D., gave a delightful and instructive résumé of his pilgrimage with The Congregationalist party to England and Holland last summer. The usual sermon was given by Rev. E. B. Burrows of the Record, and was followed by the Lord's Supper. Remarkable harmony has always been maintained between these five churches, which may be due in a measure to this long-time habit of an annual reunion for social and sacred fellowship.

Vermont.

SOUTH WALLINGFORD.—A church of nine members, with an equal number soon to follow, was organized Nov. 2. The immediate causes leading to this result were the evangelistic labors of Miss S. A. Chapin and the ministerial services of Rev. J. S. Tupper, pastor at Wallingford. A sermon appropriate to the occasion was preached by Rev. C. H. Merrill, and the Lord's Supper was administered. An old union meeting house had been refitted with modern appointments and was rededicated in the evening, Dr. G. W. Phillips preaching the sermon. At its close the necessary amount was raised and the house was dedicated free from debt.

Rhode Island.

SLATERSVILLE.—The church has had a large increase in the congregations during the past year. It is paying $200 more on the pastor's salary, and all collections have been well sustained. Nov. 1 the pastor received nine young men and women into the church by profession of faith.

PROVIDENCE.—Central. The chapel was broken into the night of Nov. 8 and over $100 worth of plated silverware was stolen. The robbers did not discover the communion service and they left behind other valuables of more worth than those stolen. They gained entrance by forcing open a side window.——Highland. Oct. 11 the first anniversary of the church was pleasantly celebrated by an evening service at which Rev. E. L. House and a Baptist pastor gave addresses.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—The program of the Ministers' Meeting for Nov. 9 was The Present Status of Methodist Missions, by Rev. H. F. Kastendieck, and for Nov. 16 Baptist Missions, by Rev. A. K. Foster.——Redeemer. The pastor, Rev. Dr. W. L. Phillips, is preaching an interesting and plain-spoken series of sermons on Enemies of Youth.——Taylor. On the evening of Nov. 8, Prof. F. C. Porter of Yale delivered an address on The Religious Significance of Old Testament History.——United. The Men's Club Sunday evening services will be resumed Nov. 22, beginning with an address by Dr. Munger. The club will hold its annual banquet Nov. 20.

BRIDGEWATER.—The old people of the town held a reception in the church on a recent Saturday. The large attendance included also quite a gathering of middle-aged persons. Refreshments, short speeches and a history of the town for the last 80 or 90 years, including quite a complete history of the church, composed the program.

NORWICH.—At a recent social, Rev. C. A. Northrop exhibited an interesting collection of old books from the pastor's library of the First Church, together with pewter and silverware, pamphlets and records, dating back to the earlier days. Some of the books bear dates as far back as 1621 and 1630.

GLASTONBURY.—The steam fitters have nearly completed their work and the new heating equipment will soon be ready for use. The pipes have been carried into the chapel, so that building also will be heated from the church heater.

DANIELSON.—At the prayer meeting service last week, a cordial letter of greeting was adopted and sent by the local church to the Congregational church at Guadalajara, Mex., by Mrs. John Howland, who returned to Mexico Saturday.

SOUTHINGTON.—First. The Ladies' Aid Society netted $112 from its recent sale. This will be added to the fund now well under way for repairing the old or building new church parlors.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

BINGHAMTON.—First. The pastor, Rev. W. B. Thorp, has taken a census of the parish by sending out cards with a list of 20 lines of church work, and asking each individual to mark those in which he could take an active interest. The response was general. The returns have been classified and referred to the different organizations in the church, and in some cases to special committees. A feature of the returns was the large number who volunteered for various lines of visiting, as among the poor, the sick, new comers, etc. A card catalogue of the entire parish is being prepared, to be placed in the church parlors.

NEW YORK.—Manhattan. The Women's Guild was organized Nov. 3. Each woman and girl who joins the church thereby becomes a member, and any other women of the congregation are gladly received to membership. The church has sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. David Blakely, a faithful member of the provisional committee and recently elected a trustee of the corporation.

CARTHAGE.—The annual meeting was held Oct. 28, and 73 members responded in person to the roll-call and 49 by messages. The membership shows a large proportionate gain in three and a half years. Rev. J. B. Felt is the pastor.

CORTLAND.—The church celebrated its 15th anniversary on Wednesday of last week with fitting music and addresses.

SYRACUSE.—Good Will. On his rounds of travel, "Ian Maclaren" lectured twice, Nov. 11, under the auspices of this church, in the largest hall of the city. The profits were over $500.

New Jersey.

UPPER MONTCLAIR.—Excellent results have been obtained in prayer meetings by devoting one evening a month to the consideration of the message of one of the books of the Bible. The members are urged to read the chosen book through, and the latter part of the hour is devoted to reciting specially impressive passages taken from it and to questions about it.

Pennsylvania.

PHILADELPHIA.—Snyder Avenue with 60 members, and 259 enrolled in its Sunday school, was recognized by council, Nov. 5. The formal service was conducted by Rev. E. W. Rice, D. D. The same council examined the pastor-elect, Mr. F. E. Wieder, for six years an elder in the Reformed Church. He was unanimously approved, and at the ordination service the sermon was preached by Dr. C. H. Richards.——Kensington has just held a successful festival, to raise a fund to complete its chapel. The congregations are increasing.——Central. The union services of the churches in this district are held with this church during the evangelistic campaign now in progress throughout the city. Rev. John Robertson, D. D., of Glasgow is the preacher and Mr. F. H. Jacobs the singer.

THE INTERIOR.

Illinois.

GLENCOE.—This church is to be congratulated on a renovated sanctuary. During the last few weeks the edifice has been painted and the interior so cleaned and beautified as hardly to be recognizable. Sunday, Nov. 8, was devoted to its rededication. Dr. Moses Smith, the pastor, was assisted in these services by Dr. J. F. Loba, his Evanston neighbor, whose presence added not a little to the pleasure of the occasion.

Indiana.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Rev. Messrs. O. D. Fisher, F. M. Whitlock and J. W. Wilson have begun a series of evangelistic meetings, to continue eight weeks. By exchange these meetings are held nightly for two weeks in succession in Mayflower, People's, South Side and Fellowship Churches. The meetings so far have been well attended, and several conversions are noted.

Ringing

Noises in the ears, sometimes a roaring, buzzing sound, or snapping like the report of a pistol, are caused by catarrh, that exceedingly disagreeable and very common disease. Loss of smell or hearing also results from catarrh. Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier, is a successful remedy for this disease, which it cures by purifying the blood.

Suffered With Catarrh.

"For years I was a constant sufferer with catarrh and a dull headache. I had no strength or appetite. When I had taken a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla I felt better, and since taking six bottles I am troubled very little with headache."—Miss ELLA WEST, Watseka, Ill.

Michigan.

ALPENA.—An appreciative testimonial was given Rev. S. S. Grinnell at the close of his pastorate, recognizing his scholarly and forceful presentations of truth and earnestness of effort. Scarcely has there been a communion at which there have not been additions during this pastorate.

LEWISTON.—This village has been under a scourge of diphtheria for a number of weeks. All services have been suspended. The quarantine is now removed, and Rev. A. M. Hills of Oberlin, who gathered the first members of the church, will begin evangelistic meetings again.

ROMEO.—The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has held a thank offering meeting in place of the regular church prayer meeting, with a special program. The attendance was large and the offerings amounted to $21. Rev. E. C. Oakley is pastor.

CHARLOTTE.—Rev. H. S. Roblee leaves Michigan for Kenosha, Wis. His going is regretted. His work in the State has won merited esteem.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

BEVIER.—First. This church holds monthly communion services. At each of these except two during the past year there have been accessions, increasing the membership from 33 to 71, while the S. S. membership has more than doubled. Though the coal mines, which support the place, are running on about one-third time, the church is raising twice as much money for current expenses as in any year of the 30 since its organization. Rev. J. R. Adams is pastor.

Iowa.

GAZA.—This is a new field, opened within six months, Rev. J. K. Nutting being the missionary pastor. No other religious service is held in the community. A milestone in the history of this enterprise was the dedication, Nov. 8, of a neat little house of worship, costing only $700, but really beautiful and an ornament to the village. Mr. Nutting was assisted in the services by Rev. Messrs. W. L. Ferris, D. E. Evans and T. O. Douglass, the first named preaching the sermon. The balance of $250 needed to free the church from debt was raised during the day. No aid was asked from the C. C. B. S.

HUMBOLDT.—Two months in advance of the close of the first year of his ministry here Rev. R. L. Marsh has been unanimously called to the permanent pastorate, at a salary of $1,400 and parsonage, and accepts the call. The church received seven accessions at the October communion. A Bible class, which continues to grow in interest and numbers, has been organized, and is conducted by the pastor. Benevolences are well sustained, and $130 have just been expended for a new barn on the parsonage property.

NORA SPRINGS.—The old stoves in the audience-room have been displaced by a furnace in the basement. The Sunday school is now larger than at any other time in the history of the church.

The Sunday Evening Club at Burlington is doing efficient work. The evening congregations often completely fill the house.

Minnesota.

ST. PAUL.—Pacific. Great spiritual and financial advance has been made since the coming of the new pastor, Rev. J. A. Jenkins. Twenty-three persons were received on confession and four by letter at the last communion. There is large attendance at all services and growing interest in Christian work. A large choir assists on Sundays.

ELK RIVER.—A parsonage has been secured which was owned by the late pastor, David Henderson. In his will he authorized the trustees to sell the property to the church at a small price for this purpose.

NORTH BRANCH.—Rev. P. H. Fisk has opened work at two out-stations, the C. E. Society relieving him of the Sunday evening service at the home church. Some financial troubles are experienced.

STAPLES.—A Sunday school has been organized at an out-station and preaching services established. This makes the second mission in care of Rev. D. W. Cram.

Kansas.

BROOKVILLE.—The church is progressing spiritually and financially. The meeting house has been renovated, a parsonage purchased and new hymn-books have been bought. The pastor's salary is kept well paid up, and both the home and foreign benevolent societies are being remembered with contributions. This field in western Kansas still feels the missionary impulse given to it by the sainted Rev. S. G. Wright, a former pastor.

CORA.—The church finds itself weakened by removals and crop failure, but is zealous spiritually

GOLD.

Carlyle said, "It is marvelous how long a rotten post will stand, provided it be not shaken." And it is equally marvelous how far out of style a woman will let her furniture drift, provided she is not reminded of it.

The engraving will give a hint of that drift, and a walk through our warerooms will tell much more. The fashion today is for gold furniture. In the chair here shown the delicate framework of gold incloses a beautiful expanse of floral tapestry. A richer effect cannot be imagined.

There is a full carved gold lattice panel at the back. The legs are gracefully carved. The seat is deeply crowned. The arms are supported by the high sides, and the chair is more luxurious than the sofa.

In such furniture as this there is an absence of the frail and tawdry character of the cheap imitations of gold cabinet work. Yet they cost but little more.

and is maintaining its services by the reading of sermons and other special methods. The C. E. Society takes charge of the evening service. The church is making strenuous efforts to repay the parsonage loan of the C. C. B. S.

MAIZE.—The church is making laudable efforts to pay up all deficits. It has an important field, especially in view of the location of Western Seminary in the town. This is a thoroughly Christian educational institution where, at small expense, superior educational advantages are afforded.

TWELVE MILE.—This rural church in Smith County was never in better condition. Though the people have been repeatedly disappointed by crop failure and the field is now pastorless, the members are united and active. Mr. L. C. Markham, a member, often conducts the services and others willingly co-operate.

Nebraska.

HARVARD.—Rev. Samuel Eveland finds his people rapidly falling into line for good work. The church had been without a leader for some time before his coming. His people spare him once a month to preach to the otherwise pastorless church at Springview, 25 miles away. The trip has to be made by stage.

LINCOLN.—First. Rev. Lewis Gregory has completed 21 years of continuous service in this church, which has existed for 30 years, and now has a membership of nearly 500. It is not burdened with debt, and owns one of the best buildings in the city.

North Dakota.

GARDNER AND ARGUSVILLE.—These two churches unite in the support of Mr. M. D. Reed, a student. The work was languishing at both points when he began, a few months ago, but is now prospering. A good Sunday school is sustained at each point, as well as regular preaching services.

KELSO.—This church, though but a year old, is doing excellent work. It has good congregations and a flourishing Sunday school and C. E. Society. Four young people, three of them church members, are attending Fargo College.

FARGO.—Plymouth. The pastor, Rev. John Orchard, is giving a series of Sunday evening sermons upon the life of Christ, illustrated with a magic lantern, which prove interesting and instructive.

CALEDONIA.—The pastor, Rev. William Griffith, is to begin work at Climax, a new town on the extension of a branch of the Great Northern Railway, on the Minnesota side of the Red River.

Colorado.

GREELEY.—Park. With 150 resident members over 100 bicycles are found among the regular congregation. Of these over 70 are in the families of members.

PACIFIC COAST.

Washington.

EAGLE HARBOR.—This church, which dedicated a new meeting house Nov. 1, is on Bainbridge Island, which is about four miles wide by 12 long and contains a population of 2,000 or more. There is no other church organization or house of worship on the island except a Baptist Scandinavian.

AMONG the attractive calendars for '97 are the English Tile Calendars from the old Wedgwood pottery. For fifteen years Jones, McDuffee & Stratton have brought them out with some historical building on one side. This year it is a reproduction of the picture of the old Federal Street Theater built in 1794 on the site of Jones, McDuffee & Stratton's store, corner of Franklin Street. The old theater was nearly opposite the Channing Church on Federal Street. The under-glaze engravings on the tile calendars make them of permanent historical value.

CHURCH CARPETS AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. JOHN H. PRAY, SONS & CO., CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, 658 WASHINGTON ST., OPP. BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.

IN MEMORY OF DR. QUINT.

The meeting of the Boston ministers last Monday took the form of a memorial service to Dr. Quint. Dr. Cobb, the first speaker, referred to Dr. Quint's strong influence over men, which was not magnetism, but rather the power of one born to command. He was many-sided, and sometimes misjudged by those who knew him only slightly, but they who knew him well could testify to his deep reverence for God and truth and his affectionate nature as illustrated in his love for children. Dr. Cobb spoke also of his relations with the American Congregational Association and particularly with the library, where by patient study and thought he prepared himself to render many of those prompt decisions and opinions which seemed the result of genius, and where also he met those from all classes who came to him for advice. Rev. F. W. Merrick of West Roxbury spoke as Dr. Quint's most recent pastor and dwelt upon his intense loyalty, suggestiveness, appreciativeness, generosity alike to friends and to strangers.

Dr. Hazen said that Dr. Quint's death marked the closing of an important epoch in Congregational life, with which the names of Cushing, Langworthy, Dexter and Quint would always be associated. He referred to Dr. Quint's long services as statistical secretary of the Massachusetts General Association. He described Dr. Quint's visit to London in attendance upon the International Council in 1891, and the service he there rendered in presenting clear and full information in regard to American councils, of which the English brethren knew but little and were somewhat suspicious.

Dr. McKenzie said that he should greatly miss Dr. Quint's hearty, familiar greeting. Dr. Quint brought to his work, as the fruit in part of his war training, the deliberation and bravery of a general combined with great tact and shrewdness in meeting men. He had the passion for his country to which a man is entitled who has suffered for it. He had done much to establish laws of precedence in ecclesiastical matters, which should be both forceful and wise. He administered the charities of the denomination faithfully and lovingly. His theological views were both practical and spiritual. In closing, Dr. McKenzie referred to Dr. Quint's article, Sealed Orders, in which every man is represented as holding in his hand a sealed envelope containing God's purposes for the day or year. For a long time Dr. Quint had been able to see, through the transparent paper of his own packet, the characters denoting that the change was soon to come, but he waited patiently, expecting the immortality in which he believed.

On motion of Mr. Merrick a committee was appointed, composed of Dr. Dunning, Mr. Merrick, Dr. Wellman and Dr. Hazen, to prepare for a public memorial service to Dr. Quint, in which the various churches to which he had ministered may have a part.

Several of the Boston churches took occasion last Sunday to recall to memory the character and deeds of Dr. Quint. In the Allston church, of which he was a member, the pastor, Rev. J. O. Haarvig, spoke of the devotion of his large abilities to the denomination he loved, and at Immanuel Church Dr. C. H. Beale spoke of the personal characteristics of the great leader in his relation to individual churches, while Dr. C. L. Morgan of the church at Jamaica Plain, of which Dr. Quint was the first pastor, spoke of him fittingly and tenderly.

Wellesley College students enjoyed a very successful Bible institute last week. One lecture was given on Thursday, two on Saturday and two on Sunday. Dr. Alexander McKenzie spoke on The Gospel in the Old Testament. Prof. F. K. Sanders of Yale and Prof. C. F. Kent of Brown discussed The Ideals of the Prophets and The Temporal and Permanent Elements in Messianic Prophecy. Large audiences were present at all the sessions.

HOME MISSIONARY FUND.

In making our first appeal for this fund in anticipation of the new year, we desire to say that the contributions for 1896 fell considerably short of the requirements of the free list of missionaries upon our books. We did not, however, stop any papers, preferring to make good the deficiency ourselves rather than deprive any workers on the frontier of their much-prized paper. We do not feel that we can do this another year, and therefore earnestly commend this fund to the attention of all our subscribers. Is there any better way of multiplying a modest benefaction? $2, $5, $10 means fifty-two messages to missionaries in the field, and furnishes inspiration for their work and tools to work with.

ESTEY ORGAN CO., BRATTLEBORO, VT.

THE BOSTON YOUNG MEN'S CONGREGATIONAL CLUB.

The first dinner and meeting of this new organization was held at the American House, Wednesday evening last, and if its first meeting was a type of later ones, then a new factor in denominational affairs has to be reckoned with. Sixty-five young men sat at the feet of the speakers of the evening, and more than sixty members were enrolled as charter members. The social season preceding the dinner was one of zest and pleasure. Pres. Morris A. Hall of the Leyden Church, Brookline, presided. Resolutions expressing the sorrow of the club because of Dr. Quint's death and its sympathy for his kindred were drafted and passed.

Pres. A. H. Wellman of the Boston Congregational Club brought the fraternal greetings of that body, and pointed out some of the defects, as well as virtues, of the Congregational polity and spirit—defects which he warned his hearers against perpetuating. He believes that it is possible to centralize Congregationalism more without its losing any of its power in developing strong individual character, Rev. Dr. A. E. Dunning of The Congregationalist set forth some of the history of the denomination and brought out into sharp relief three of the great principles which it has held and which have accounted for its success and high place in the world. These he defined as freedom to worship, opportunity to ascertain truth through free and universal education, and Christian unity as seen in the fellowship of all who reproduce the Christ-life. Hon. S. B. Capen pleaded for resolute participation by the club in settling local and national problems, in purging the city of Boston from its evils, etc. He hoped for a minimizing of the cuisine and the exaltation of serious thought and resolute action.

The next meeting of the club will be held Dec. 2. Applications for membership should be sent to W. Fred Berry, Congregational Bookstore, 1 Somerset Street, Boston.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. WILLIAM H. ALLWORTH.

Plymouth Church, Lansing, Mich., suffers a great loss in the death, Oct. 29, of one of its members, Rev. William H. Allworth, familiarly called "Father Allworth," at the age of 78. He graduated from the Congregational College of British North America in 1845, and was ordained in 1848. Most of his work was done in Canada, whence he was called to the church in Memphis, Mich., in 1888. At the close of his remarks at the midweek service, last Thursday, he suddenly sank to the floor and at once passed away.

CHARLES W. HILL.

Deacon Hill died suddenly of heart disease at his home in Roxbury last Friday night. He had been at his duties in school as usual during the day. For nearly forty years he has been a teacher in the public schools of the State and for the greater part of this time in Boston. He was successively master of the Comins and Martin Schools in Roxbury, and since 1890 he has been at the head of the Bowditch School for girls in Jamaica Plain. For more than a quarter of a century he was a deacon of Eliot Church in Roxbury and for fifteen years its Sunday school superintendent. He was an ex-president of the Boston Congregational Club. He served nearly a year during the Civil War in the Fifth Massachusetts Regiment. Deacon Hill was one of the strong laymen of Boston whose influence was widely felt for good. His voice was often heard in public assemblies, and on the Sunday evening before his death he spoke at a temperance rally in Curtis Hall, Jamaica Plain. He was a self-made scholar, an ideal teacher, a Christian gentleman, beloved by thousands of pupils whose characters he has done much to mold. He was sixty-two years of age. He leaves a widow. His only son died last autumn.

PROF. H. E. PARKER.

Prof. H. E. Parker of Dartmouth College died in Boston, Nov. 7. He was born April 17, 1821; graduated from Dartmouth in 1841 at the age of twenty. From 1857 to 1869 he was a pastor in Concord, N. H., except when away at the war serving as a chaplain. He began his career as a teacher as an instructor in Latin at Dartmouth in 1869, and filled the chair until 1890. Few Dartmouth professors were better known or more beloved.

TRUTH IN BOSTON.—There is a great deal of sober truth in the deductions from Carlyle which appear in the Paine Furniture Co.'s advertisement in another column of this issue. Some people only recognize truth when it is clad in a wedding garment; nude truth is not recognized. But we hope none of our readers will fail to take seriously to mind the valuable truth in the announcement we have just mentioned. It applies with peculiar force to Bostonians.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

Here is some sensible advice from Republican journals to which we heartily say, "Amen." "We can't drift any more. It is time now to do something. Our money must be put on a basis where it cannot be so open to attack. Just so long as we have a lot of greenbacks in existence we are in danger. The greenbacks are mere promises to pay—demand notes. When we have paid them we should treat them as every sensibly managed concern treats its paid notes—tear off the signatures, or cancel them on their face, and retire them from sight. It's coming time for some clear-headed and courageous statesmanship at Washington," says The Hartford Courant; while The Indianapolis News affirms: "There is one salvation for this county, and that is in the next four years for its finances to be put on a scientific basis, as the finances of other civilized countries are. This, and this alone, will maintain stability. It should not be forgotten, and it cannot be spoken of or written on with too much emphasis, that the result of the election just held is simply permission to settle the money question. Our financial situation is the same that it was. If we do not lay hold of it and reform it, we are gone."

A Universalist pastor, asserting that "the Congregational polity is 'absolescent,'" the Christian Leader, the Universalists' leading paper, replies: "On what data does he make such an affirmation? The Congregational body in England is more thoroughly alive and more prosperous than any other sect in the realm, unless it be another congregational body, the Baptists. The Congregationalists in the United States are the foremost missionary body in this country, and though they are restricted in their area of operations by the prevalence of Presbyterianism in the greater portion of the country, their ratio of progress is equal to that of the Episcopalians. The Baptists are a purely congregational denomination, and they rank second only to Methodists. If the 'congregational polity is absolescent,' it is not hurt by that disease, whatever it is."

ABROAD.

This statement of the London St. James Gazette is somewhat fantastic, but it embodies a kernel of truth: "Lord Salisbury's great admission of the principle that the United States have the right to intervene in frontier disputes of the American Powers and compel the disputants to arbitrate altogether transcends in importance the question of the Guiana boundary. It is a formal recognition of the hegemony of the United States on the American continent, and gives the President the position in the new world which the mediæval popes and emperors tried vainly to claim in Europe." The London Times says: "This is a most far-reaching concession, and a signal diplomatic success for the United States, and is interesting to the Americans much more keenly than any mere rearrangement of Venezuelan territory. It secures to England the advantages of dealing with a responsible and friendly government, and admits the principle that the United States may not only intervene in disputes with South American republics, but may entirely supersede the original disputant and assume exclusive control of the negotiations. Great Britain cannot bind other nations by this concession, but she sets up a precedent which may in future be quoted with great effect against herself, and she has greatly strengthened the hands of the United States Government should the latter desire to intervene in any future dispute between a South American republic and any European Power."

Dr. Barrett recently suggested to his fellow British Congregational clergymen that they resume the habit of donning pulpit robes, whereupon a great controversy broke forth and now rages in the columns of the press. Such sentiments as the following we cull from the letters of correspondents in The Christian World: "A Free Church minister in a gown is a spiritual monstrosity. The crying need is for men in the pulpit, and Dr. Barrett would give us millinery." "Reverence is not proportioned to gowns or incense, nor is reality of worship measured by æsthetic silence any more than by Salvation Army shouting." "When Spurgeon poured out his soul before 7,000 people he not only wore no gown, but was without that 'last rag of popery,' as he termed it, the white tie, yet every soul present felt his authority."

SICK HEADACHE RELIEVED.—Brighton, Mass., Oct. 4, 1896. "I cannot speak too highly of Hood's Sarsaparilla, which I have found to be worth double its price. I have also been much pleased with Hood's Pills, and they have given me a relief from headache, and I always use them in my family."—William Humphrys, Taylor Street.

HOOD'S SARSAPARILLA is the one true blood purifier prominent in the public eye today.

AN INFLUENTIAL ADDRESS.

We have received from the Business Men's Non-Partisan Sound Money League of Boston the following letter:

We desire to express our sincere thanks to The Congregationalist and its readers for the distributing and advertising of the address entitled The National Crisis of 1896, which was delivered by Hon. S. B. Capen, one of the vice-presidents of our league.

There was a greater demand from individuals for Mr. Capen's address than for any of the other pamphlets which we published. The call was so great from all parts of the country that we were obliged to cut down the orders from all the States except the doubtful ones. From Michigan, Nebraska, the two Dakotas, California, Indiana and Illinois came calls for from 100 to 2,000 copies.

The only regret we have is that Mr. Capen did not deliver his address in midsummer instead of within six weeks of the election. As a consequence we did not feel warranted in printing but 30,000 copies, owing to the shortness of time. When the readers of The Congregationalist understand this, they will, we believe, agree with us that it was better to give the orders from the doubtful States the preference. We received hundreds of letters from the West saying that this article of Mr. Capen's was the best presentation of the issues of the campaign that they had seen. I have no hesitation in saying that I consider this address was of great help in carrying the doubtful States for honest money and national honor.

The influence of the religious papers in bringing about this glorious victory was widespread and effective. We congratulate The Congregationalist on the hearty support they gave to the cause of national integrity and good government. With the majority of the press, both secular and religious, on the side of sound money, the result could not have been otherwise.

Thanking The Congregationalist for the support which it gave us and with the hope that it will always maintain its high standard and influence of the past, I remain,

FRED W. MEARS,
Secretary in charge of headquarters, Business Men's Non-Partisan Sound Money League

THE BAY CONFERENCE AND THE DUBUQUE ASSOCIATION.

In our issue of Oct. 22 an account was given of the action of the Dubuque Association receiving into its membership Rev. Dr. C. O. Brown, who is under suspension by the Bay Conference of California. This last named body met in Oakland, Oct. 29, and adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas, The Dubuque Association of Congregational churches and ministers has essayed to receive to its membership in good standing a member of this conference while under suspension and without letters of transfer; therefore,

Resolved, That the personal standing of the member affected is no longer the chief matter of interest, being eclipsed by the larger and more general question of fellowship raised by this action.

That this conference recognizes the following principles as embodying its conception of the case:

1. Every local conference or association, like every local church, is wholly independent in the management of its own affairs.

2. The determination of the standing of its members is lodged in the local conference or association.

3. Every co-ordinate body within the Congregational fellowship is bound by the principles of Congregationalism to respect this right thus lodged in the local conference or association.

4. In case of alleged injustice, the remedy lies in appeal to an ecclesiastical council and in that alone; hence,

5. To receive a member from such a conference or association into another, in any way except by orderly transfer from said conference or association, or upon the finding of an ecclesiastical council, is to commit a breach of fellowship.

Resolved, Therefore, that the said action of the Dubuque Association in the premises is, in our judgment, unwarranted, and in open violation of our Congregational fellowship, the determination of the standing of its members being lodged in the local conference or association.

Resolved, That we request the Dubuque Association to consider this preamble and resolution at its earliest convenience in a fraternal spirit, the spirit in which it was adopted, and to take such action in the matter as will conserve the interests of denominational fellowship.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed and given power, in case the Dubuque Association does not see its way to take the desired action, subsequently to request a mutual council and to present the case of the conference, and, if finally necessary, which may God forbid, to call an ex parte council.

A DECEMBER TOUR ACROSS THE CONTINENT.—The winter tours to California under the auspices of Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb are carefully planned and carried out to meet the wishes of the most exacting travelers. The next party, under the care of experienced conductors, will leave Boston on Monday, Dec. 14, spend a day in Chicago, and proceed thence to San Diego by way of Kansas City. If desired the entire winter can be spent on the Pacific coast, the return tickets being good until next July, and there is a choice of three returning routes. An illustrated descriptive book will be sent free to any address by Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, opposite School Street. There are also trips to Old Mexico, to Florida and Nassau and to Europe.

If we told you that your baby was starving, that it actually didn't get enough to eat, you might resent it. And yet there are thousands of babies who never get the fat they should in their food or who are not able to digest the fat that they do get. Fat is a necessity to your baby. It is baby life and baby beauty. A few drops of Scott's Emulsion for all little ones one, two and three years of age is better than cream for them. They thrive and grow on it.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Matinicus Island, Me., which has no church or minister, supports a successful Junior society.

Three hundred dollars toward a lot for a new church have been raised by the society in Danville, Ill.

The Scotch Endeavorers began last month to issue a monthly of 16 pages devoted to the interests of the society.

San Francisco's interest in the next convention is illustrated by the fact that one society raised its share of the convention expenses in one hour.

The Broadview Avenue Congregational Society of Toronto, Ont., was the first to enter the campaign against the movement for Sunday street cars in its city.

Quite a missionary library has been collected by a society that began by purchasing a single volume. A fee of five cents was charged each time this was lent to a member, and the money thus raised was used to buy other books.

A California plan for prolonging the usefulness of meetings is to have the prayer meeting committee note down in a book the best thought brought out at each meeting and introduce these into the celebration of the society's anniversary.

Mexico's societies increased almost 40 per cent. and her Junior societies 100 per cent. during the two months after her national convention, and the work is being systematized by the formation of unions and assignment of work to district secretaries.

The several thousand programs left after the Washington convention, and containing 50 pages of words and music, are offered for sale by the committee of '96 at rates from two and a half to 10 cents each according to the order, the receipts to go toward the convention expenses. They are well suited for use in local gatherings. Address Grant Leet, Washington, D. C.

In Sweden many young people's societies have adopted some features of Christian Endeavor, but not all. At a meeting of the Swedish Sunday School Union one day and part of another were given to a discussion of Christian Endeavor. Much had been said on the subject before, and a leaflet had been widely circulated. Dr. Clark spoke and removed some misunderstandings, and on the following Sunday gave four addresses to large audiences in three different churches of Stockholm. Christian Endeavor received a hearty welcome, and it was decided to adopt the principles and name.

An active society in Geelong, Australia, consisting of two Young People's Societies and three Junior Societies and having a membership that has grown from fifteen to 550 in six years, issues an annual report. They have held 200 cottage prayer meetings and seventy-eight meetings in the open air during the year. The missionary committee made 3,400 visits, and the sunshine committee 851, while the Junior sunshine committee made 540. The Endeavorers maintain a men's club, a boys club, a club for Bible study and a reading circle for the Juniors. A weekly musical hour is provided for the benefit of those unable to go to church. Nearly $700 were spent for benevolence, entertainments being provided for poor children, Chinese and inmates of homes, while gifts of flowers, food, clothing and good reading were distributed to many in need.

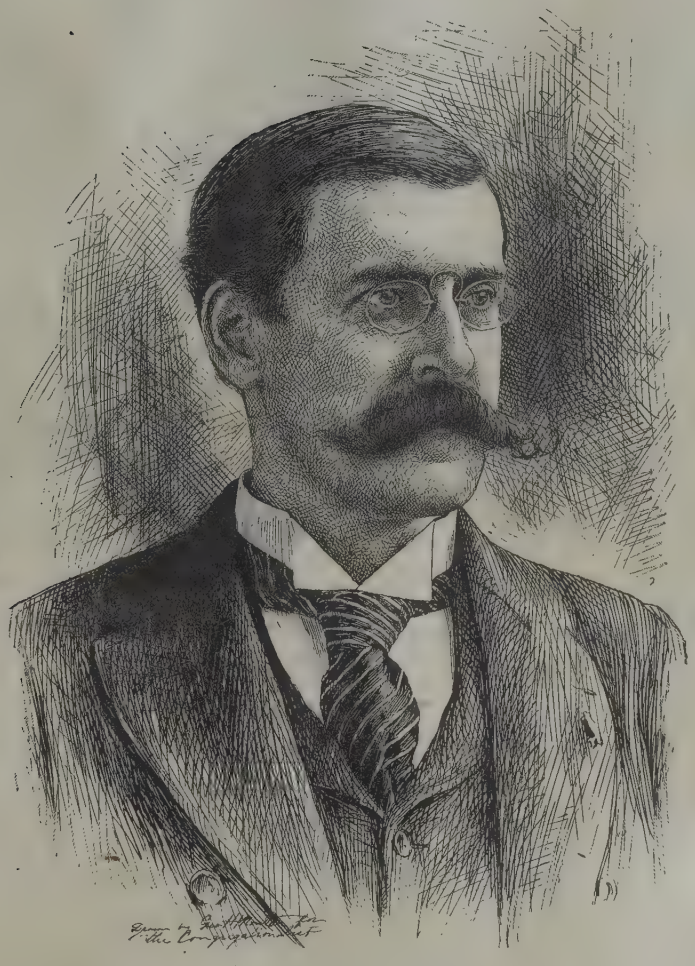
THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 26 November 1896



REV. SAMUEL LANE LOOMIS.

The new pastor of the Union Church, Boston.

NO words can tell, brethren, no words can commence to tell, how tremendous is the importance of giving to our working people the knowledge of God through Jesus Christ. As water cannot be boiled by applying heat at the top, so society cannot be saved by a religion of the upper classes. Christianity from the nature of it cannot remain the religion of a class; it must be the religion of the whole people or that of none. . . . When a down-town church finds its old supporters moving away to the suburbs, instead of picking up its hymn-books and hastening after them, instead of selling its old building for a warehouse or a skating rink and abandoning the neighborhood with its increasing multitude of dying men, except so far as the Catholics may save them, to the saloons and to the devil, why should it not recognize the changed condition of affairs and equip itself for doing the new kind of work and reaping the new harvests that grow up rich and rank on every side, by employing workers whom nature and experience have fitted for that style of labor? Why should it not manfully stand its ground and expect the truth to triumph?—Mr. Loomis, in his book entitled Modern Cities.

A TIMELY BOOK.

Christianity and Social Problems.

By LYMAN ABBOTT, D. D., author of "The Evolution of Christianity," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"We have not space to say all that is in our mind about this valuable and extremely interesting book, but we earnestly commend it to those of our thoughtful readers who, bewildered by the problems of the time, are seeking some solution which may satisfy their own minds and convince them that the principles which Christ laid down are the true foundations of all social order, and the only feasible solutions of those harassing problems which so many are vainly trying to solve by human devices and cunningly devised systems."—Pacific Churchman.

"We heartily commend the volume to all thoughtful readers, for it is filled with valuable thought finely expressed, and it has noble and elevating aims always in view. It takes up a subject which, in the strife between classes, must have the deepest interest to the American of today."—Christian Intelligencer, New York.

"One of the most timely, thoughtful and helpful books of the year. . . . We would like to have every young man read the chapter on 'The Law of Service,' and all employers and employés that on 'The Standard of Values' and the one on the settlement of labor controversies; all legislators every chapter in the book, and all teachers and preachers as well."—Northern Christian Advocate.

WITH OPEN FACE;

Or, Jesus Mirrored in Matthew, Mark and Luke. By A. B. BRUCE, D. D. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

"The author's rare ability as a writer, his independence of thought and careful inspection of the subject always command both admiration and attention. This volume is a series of 'popular' sketches of the spirit and teaching of our Lord, the 'overflow' in the preparation of a work on the first three Gospels for professional students. It presents the distinctive traits of Christ as seen in each of the three Gospels—the Man, the Christ, the Lord, the prophetic picture of Matthew, the realistic picture of Mark, the idealized picture of Luke."—The Presbyterian.

GOD, CREATOR, AND LORD OF ALL.

By SAMUEL HARRIS, D. D., LL. D., Professor of Systematic Theology, Yale University. 2 vols., 8vo, $5.00 net.

"Two noble volumes. There are four principal divisions: God the only absolute Spirit, God the Creator, God the Lord of all in Providential Government, and God the Lord of all in Moral Government. Dr. Harris's style is absorbingly interesting. He possesses a remarkable power of lighting up the most profound speculations and the most abtruse themes."—Boston Advertiser.

JESUS CHRIST BEFORE HIS MINISTRY.

By EDMOND STAPFER, Professor in the Faculty of Protestant Theology at Paris. Translated from the French by Louise Seymour Houghton. 12 mo, $1.25.

M. Edmond Stapfer considers in this volume the earlier portion of Christ's life. Professor Stapfer's standpoint is a wholly personal one, differing entirely from that of Strauss and Renan, and yet unlike theologians, taking no account of the formally miraculous. It is a spiritual biography, based solely on the Gospel record, following reverently and sympathetically the interior developments of the mind and heart of Jesus, and the gradual awakening of his Messianic consciousness. It will be followed by two other volumes, completing the life of Christ.

BIBLE STUDY UNION LESSONS
FOR 1897.

THE BIBLE STUDY UNION (or BLAKESLEE) LESSONS and the International Lessons for 1897 are both on the Acts and Epistles.

The imperative and growing demand for better methods of Bible Study, and the marked success of our lessons, have led us to prepare two New Courses for 1897, viz.:—

A Most Attractive Biographical Course:

THE THREE GREAT APOSTLES, PETER, PAUL, and JOHN.

Published in three Grades—Junior, Intermediate, and Progressive—with a Manual, making a Uniform Lesson for the Main School.

An Exceedingly Interesting Bible Class Course:

APOSTOLIC TEACHINGS.

A Series of Great Topics for Discussion.

Based on the same Scripture as the Course on The Three Great Apostles, and used in harmony with it. Published in the Senior Grade, with a Manual.

WEEKLY NOTES on these Lessons will appear in The Evangelist and Christian Work, of New York, The Watchman, of Boston, and other papers.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Are you satisfied to allow your school to study this portion of Scripture in the same old way that they have many times before, or will you secure for them the far greater help and inspiration that will surely result from using these new Lessons?

RARELY has so spontaneous and so general a tribute been paid to any minister as Dr. Storrs has received during the ten-days' celebration of his Jubilee Anniversary. His own church, his neighbors, his ministerial brethren and his fellow-citizens have vied with one another to do him honor. The press, not only in Brooklyn, but throughout the country, has been unstinted in expressions of esteem for the great preacher and orator. These tributes are not merely testimonials of regard and affection for the man; they witness to the profound respect of the people for the Christian ministry as represented by one who has for fifty years proclaimed the gospel of Christ with rare gifts of eloquence, but with the far nobler power of unfaltering faith in that gospel as able to transform any and all men into saints and sons of God. This celebration has given a new emphasis to revealed truth. It has been a fresh recognition of the present power of that truth in human life. It has exalted the ministry, and it cannot be without encouragement to young men entering that calling to do their best that they may win, with the approval of God, the respect and confidence of all who honor him. These meetings in Brooklyn and New York, some of which we chronicle in this issue, once more demonstrate that the noblest of all callings is to preach the glorious gospel of the blessed God.

Union Church, Boston, has installed a leader conspicuously well suited for the present epoch in its life. Its friends, among whom are included many who have transferred their relations to Back Bay and suburban churches, rejoice with the resolute band now composing its working force in the happy inception of a pastorate which gives promise of being no less fruitful than those which have preceded it. Mr. Loomis's methods will naturally vary considerably from those pursued by Dr. Nehemiah Adams, Dr. Meredith and Dr. Boynton. His ministry will have to be in considerable degree to a floating population which contributes comparatively little to the stability and resources of a church. But whatever measure of success he attains will not only preserve and build up a historic Boston church, but will encourage and instruct workers in similar fields all over the country.

The C. H. M. S. finds itself again in the deep waters from which it seemed, a few months ago, to be emerging. Its receipts during the last seven months are $110,000 less than during the corresponding seven months of last year. The committee reduced the appropriations for the coming year $20,000 below the average receipts of the last five years, but the falling off in legacies and contributions is more than fifty per cent. The balance of last year's debt, left unpaid by the Howard Roll of Honor, was $35,803. The society has borrowed in addition $143,196, making its total indebtedness at the banks $179 000. It can borrow no more at present, and in consequence the missionaries go unpaid. Many of them have been weeks and months without any income. The statement is the most emphatic appeal which can be made to our churches to relieve their suffering brethren. The balance of the Stickney legacy, about $87,000, consists of securities which the Executive Committee has voted to dispose of as soon as it can be done wisely and to turn the proceeds into the treasury for current expenditures. But there still remains a burdensome debt which ought to be removed before the end of the year.

A number of Negro citizens met last week in Boston to take measures to secure the election of a colored man on the school committee. They did not say what the advantage would be to the educational interests of the city to have a man with a black skin on the school board, but they said much about the advantage thus to be gained by persons of their own color. If our Negro fellow-citizens have a candidate of superior wisdom, integrity and experience as an educator, we will advocate his election. But from the way they cheered a recently elected State official of their own race, when he practically advised them to put up their votes as bribes for office, we fear that their motive is not to get the best men on the school committee, but to get Negroes in that office for their own advantage. If this is their object they will fail in it and will hinder the progress of their race here. Negroes seem to be apt to learn the trickier and meaner ways of politicians, but their best friends will advise them to aim at good citizenship for their race rather than for public office. In that way they will really get the most for themselves and help to obliterate the color line, to which some of them seem ambitious to direct public attention.

Mr. Moody daily speaks to audiences which fill to overflowing the Cooper Union Building in New York city. The interest manifested is deep. The majority of those who attend are church members. The addresses are simple, direct, searching. Mr. Sankey's singing has its old-time power of appeal. The presence of the Holy Spirit is evident in the awakened faith, the penitent confessions, the upward aspirations, the holy resolves of multitudes. No believer, we are confident, would attribute to Mr. Moody or Mr. Sankey the power which sways these thousands and pervades the very atmosphere with the spirit of prayer and praise. At Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, Dr. Lyman Abbott on Sunday evenings is addressing audiences which fill the house on The Bible, its history, its structure and its character as giving to us knowledge of God. His hearers are profoundly interested. At the close of the discourse they ply him with questions, not for the purpose of controversy, but because of their eagerness for information.

Mr. Moody and Dr. Abbott hold quite different views about the Bible, while they share in the common purpose to bring men to know and obey God. Mr. Moody has discovered great spiritual truths in the Bible, and by the aid of the Holy Spirit proclaims them with power. Dr. Abbott, in addition to his knowledge of these spiritual truths, has studied the history of the Bible in the light of recent researches and discoveries. In that light he answers questions which men want to know, which Mr. Moody does not claim to be able to answer because he has never given attention to them. It would, therefore, be quite outside of his province to criticise Dr. Abbott's statements, and it is not wise, either, for the disciples of one teacher to criticise the other. It is better to receive from each what each has to give, remembering that both profess to be disciples of the same Master and that both are in the same denominational fellowship. Mr. Moody will begin daily services in Tremont Temple, Boston, with the Week of Prayer in January.

A New York Jewish rabbi has censured President Cleveland for referring—though not by name—to Jesus Christ in his Thanksgiving proclamation. We are informed that a movement is on foot among Jews in New York city, Cincinnati and elsewhere to express in a formal way their disapproval of the President's words. We would remind these Jews that belief in Jesus Christ as the one mediator between God and man represents the prevailing religious faith in this republic. While Jews have been bitterly persecuted in European nations, they have not been persecuted here. Anti-Semitic agitators have found scant courtesy in the United States. But Jews driven out of Russia, abused in Austria and legislated against in Germany have been welcomed in America. And the sympathy for them which has found generous expression here was largely the fruit of the Christian spirit in a nation the large majority of whose people are believers in Christ. For Jews to inveigh against the President for referring to Christ in a proclamation for a time-honored religious festival inaugurated by the disciples of Christ and adopted by the nation is to show bad taste, bad manners, bad policy and bad hearts. The Old Testament never taught Jews to find fault with the inhabitants of their cities of refuge. If they wish to stay peacefully in this modern asylum, they should take heed not to bring their religion into needless collision with Christianity.

MEN FIT FOR PUBLIC BUSINESS.

In private business it is a well-established principle that only those succeed who understand their work. Men are not employed to manage electrical plants because they are virtuous or popular or able to command votes. It is essential that they should be honest and reliable, but it is also absolutely necessary that they should have a practical knowledge of electricity. Slowly, but surely, the conviction is taking hold of the people that public business also can succeed only when men who have charge of it understand it.

Only a few years ago two vast armies of men watched every election with the keenest personal interest. One army watched to see whether or not they would continue to have work. The other and larger army watched to see whether places would be made vacant for them to fill. Neither cared much about fitness to do the work. Both were principally interested in the wages which the victorious administration would pay. The greatest menace to popular government was the political trusts created by popular elections for the controlling of all public offices. Other trusts are bad enough, but none have taken so much money out of the pockets of the people and wasted it as these.

Civil Service reform has progressed slowly and against great opposition from these political trusts, but it has made a substantial progress which is increasing. Both these armies have been greatly reduced in numbers during the present Administration. The principle of Civil Service is having increasing effect in local elections. Citizens are coming to realize that the management of a city government is a business affair, and that knowledge of that business is required of the mayor and his subordinates. They are beginning to see that his continuance in office ought to depend on his doing their business successfully, not on his gratifying an army of men seeking wages from the city. It is yet a long way to the application to public business of the principles which are found to be necessary in private business. But the movement sets in that direction.

The same principle is forced on the attention of the people by the great problems of national government which demand solution. The political campaign just closed has taught many persons important things about finance and the tariff. It has also led many to realize how little qualified they are to decide what is the best policy for the Government on these great questions. They are made to see that few of those they have chosen to be legislators are experts on these subjects, while yet the prosperity of the country largely depends on what legislators shall decide about them.

Hitherto politicians have largely governed this country and have represented it abroad. Some of them have been statesmen, put in fit places oftener by accident than by selection on the ground of fitness. When dissatisfaction has grown too great to be borne, the people have changed one set of politicians for another. The campaign just closed has shown an increasing number of citizens who wish to take the Government into their own hands. Some would do this by the referendum, deciding particular measures by popular vote. Others would put natural monopolies into the hands of the Government. Such changes proposed, whether wise or unwise, indicate the growing impatience of having the public business managed by men unfit for it, however good their intentions or however great their influence. It is encouraging to note that a new word is coming into prominence to describe a class of men doing public business. It is the word "commissioner." It is better than "politician." The Bering Sea difficulty with England was referred to a commission of experts. So was the Venezuelan question. There is talk of a tariff commission and a commission to study the currency problem and report on it to the coming Congress. Railroad commissioners have not only guarded the interests of the people but have much improved the business of transportation. The meaning of all this is simply that the public business is to be administered, by and by, on the same principles as private business. The mere politician begins to see the handwriting on the wall. His day is not past, but it is passing.

In these things there is encouragement for young men to fit themselves for definite work in public as they now do for private business. Changes in popular government are certain to open the way for men of integrity, trained for public positions, to do service worthy of their highest ambition. Our country needs men fitted to do its business. It promises them hearty appreciation and satisfactory rewards.

BIBLE STUDY FOR 1897.

About this time the courses of Bible study for the coming year are being determined for many millions of people. For the majority of them, indeed, the decision is practically made already. So far as they read the Bible they will be guided by the selections of the International Lesson Committee. On these, in this country alone, for the successive weeks of the year, the attention of more than a million teachers will be fixed, and they will try to make the meaning of these passages plain to several millions of scholars. These topics will be treated in countless printed pages, and daily readings connected with them will to a large extent direct the devotional life of this nation.

The service thus rendered is a very great one, for a large proportion of this multitude, if they read the Bible at all, would read it only occasionally and in disconnected fragments if these outlines were not provided for them with the stimulus of fellowship in reading and study. But the work done for them does not relieve pastors and Sunday school teachers of the responsibility of choosing for themselves and their pupils what parts of the Bible they shall study and how they shall do it. It may not be the best way to develop the minds of a particular class, or, indeed, of the entire school, to pursue the same method of study next year which has been followed for a series of years. Perhaps some other method may hold those who have had enough of the present one and are thinking about leaving the school.

It is not settled that the same lesson, or even the same topic, however variously treated, is the best for every class in the school. New discoveries concerning the Bible have created a demand for new ways of studying it. Questions about it are arising in the popular mind which can be answered only by a careful examination of its books in the light of other contemporary writings and of literature lately discovered which is much older than these books. If Christian leaders ignore these questions or seek to repress them, others will attempt to answer them, and the Christian church will make a colossal blunder if she does not interpret her own oracles so as to satisfy inquiring minds better than teachers who do not acknowledge that her authority is from God. Are there not in many churches adult classes who demand from competent teachers instruction which is not within the scope of the International Lessons?

But for those who follow these lessons—as most will—there is room, especially this year, for great variety. The subject is the most interesting in the whole Bible, next to the life of Christ. It is the history of the founding of his church. The selections for the entire year are from the book of the Acts, with a few from the Epistles, mostly arranged with appropriate historical setting. The verses to be printed are only a portion of the lesson to be studied, but in connection with them larger sections are indicated, so that the entire history of the church in the New Testament is brought within the scope of the student's vision, according as he is prepared to consider it. This is a great improvement on the two preceding courses of International Lessons from the Acts. The treatment of the topics in The Congregationalist for 1897 will aim at the consideration of the entire history, grouping around the principal events the facts and teachings by which the foundations of the church were laid and interpreting their meaning as applied to the church in our own time.

Literature in abundance is published, furnishing a great variety of treatment in interpreting the Acts and Epistles along the lines indicated by the International Lessons. But it is not even necessary to adhere closely to these lines in order to gain many of the advantages which come from so large a proportion of the churches studying the same topic at the same time. Mr. Blakeslee has published an excellent manual of lessons in the Acts. Dr. B. B. Loomis has written a little volume (issued by the Methodist Book Concern), which is a good example of normal studies in the same book. Prof. J. M. Stifler has treated the book according to a method suited for philosophical study in a volume published by the F. H. Revell Co. These are illustrations of a number of independent outlines of value, from which teachers and students may choose while they unite in the study of the general subject on which next year a very large proportion of Christians will concentrate their thoughts—the record in the New Testament of its founding and early years.

The essential thing at this time is that careful consideration should be given to the plans for next year's study. In every church provision should be made to meet reverently and wisely the questions concerning the Bible which are arising in the minds of the people. Some systematic study should be arranged which will attract the whole congregation and in which they can unite for the year. Such plans should be adopted as will not only instruct all the people, but will quicken the spiritual life of Christians and tend to make all students of the Bible enthusiastic disciples of Christ and eager recipients of the gift of the Holy Spirit. The mottoes for all our Sunday schools in 1897 may well be: "The entrance of thy words giveth light"; "He that followeth me shall have the light of life."

DR. QUINT AND CHRISTIAN SCIENTISTS.

The Transcript editorially stated a few days ago that Dr. Quint, being appealed to concerning the case of a member of a Congregational church who wished to unite with what is called the First Church of Christ, Scientist, promptly decided that a letter of dismission and recommendation to that organization ought to be given, and that if the church refused to grant it, it would subject itself to denominational discipline. Having had a somewhat intimate acquaintance with Dr. Quint and several conversations with him concerning this subject, we feel fully warranted in saying that the Transcript is mistaken. Any one who has known him, and who understands Congregational usages, will smile at the suggestion about "denominational discipline," but hardly any one so well as he could appreciate the humor of it. He would have been immensely amused at the announcement of the Transcript that his decision thus made will probably be accepted as final in all similar cases. These statements of themselves are enough to show that the writer of the article referred to is not very familiar with Dr. Quint's views on Congregationalism.

Dr. Quint, we are confident, never intended to advise a Congregational church to give letters of recommendation to any organization with which Congregational churches are not in fellowship. He did not advise giving such letters to the Salvation Army, though he heartily admired its work. He did not, however, regard it as a church, since it does not observe the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and is not organized as a Christian church.

But this particular matter is settled by the fact that a case similar to that mentioned in the Transcript was referred to Dr. Quint a short time before his death, and his answer, when given, was written from his dictation. He quoted a rule of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, which says, "This church will receive a member of another Church of Christ, Scientist, but not a member of a church of a different denomination." That, he said, was a sufficient answer to the question. But, he added, "A certificate can be given saying that a member in good and regular standing is, at her own request, released from her covenant obligations to this church on account of a decided change of views."

The Cambridge Platform, which for more than 200 years was regarded as an accepted statement of the polity of Congregational churches, declares that "a church cannot make a member no member except by excommunication." Dr. Quint believed this to be an unjust rule. He held that if a member of a Congregational church, in good standing, wished to withdraw in order to unite with any organization with which our churches are not in fellowship, it would be reasonable for the church, failing to persuade him to remain, to consent that he be no longer under its watch and care and to direct that his name be dropped from the list. He gave his reasons for advocating this course in an article published in The Congregationalist of Feb. 2, 1888, entitled, Is the Church a Prison? This must be the only basis for the statement made by the Transcript.

While we are on this topic, we take occasion to suggest that it is hardly fair to Dr. Quint's memory to put into his mouth sayings not consonant with opinions he was generally known to hold—sayings for which there is no documentary evidence. For example, the Churchman publishes a statement that he said, a few years ago, that if he were a younger man he would go into the Episcopal Church, adding, "Two of my sons have already become members of it, a third is singing in an Episcopal choir and is sure to follow his brothers." Dr. Quint then had only two sons. One of them expects soon to enter the Congregational ministry. The other is not, and never was, a member of the Episcopal Church. He writes us, "The story is absurd. My father never could have spoken in any such manner, for he did not feel that way." The Congregational polity is pretty well understood and to those who know Dr. Quint it would be rather difficult to prove, at this late date, that he was ready to renounce it.

INTOLERANCE AND CHARITY.

Intolerance often is the exaggerated form of a virtue. It is unlovely and mischievous, but in many instances it is due to a strength of conviction the lack of which in its proper degree would be a grave defect in character. We are so confident that we are right and in harmony with the divine will that we allow ourselves to distrust the conscientiousness of those who disagree with us. One of the lessons hardest and latest to be mastered by most Christians is the learning to allow to others the same right of private judgment which we claim for ourselves, and this is especially noticeable in respect to matters of conduct.

Progress, however, is apparent in this as in other respects as one studies the history of the past half-century. There is less insistence, on the whole, upon rigid uniformity of belief or of behavior when it is evident that the underlying principles of religion are intended to be honored. Indeed, the pendulum sometimes seems to be swinging too far the other way. The excessive tendency to individualism, which is so conspicuous a characteristic of our times, occasionally appears to promote an unsafe readiness to permit lapses in both faith and service which are detrimental. Yet intolerance is no proper corrective of them.

Here, as elsewhere, personal example is the most effective remedy. Exhortation accomplishes comparatively little. Fault-finding is worth still less. But the evidence of consecration in holy conduct seldom fails to be heeded. The sweet spirit of charity, when it pervades a human life like a sort of atmosphere, makes wide and lasting impressions upon even those most difficult to be touched. That love for others which Jesus felt and which every real Christian exhibits in some degree, which prompts instant and tender sympathy for all in distress and suggests helpful ministries in word or act—this not only blesses others but enriches our own hearts and strengthens them for whatever they are called upon to do or to suffer.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Boston's Saloons.

Many of the officials of Boston's temperance organizations and opponents of the saloon in residential districts have agreed on the main features of a law which they hope the coming legislature will pass. It will provide that certain districts, formerly separate political units like Brighton, Roxbury and Dorchester, be given the opportunity to vote upon the question of license or no license, and if they vote no license then the police commissioners will be debarred from placing saloons within the district so voting. But lest this seem to work selfishly in favor of the fortunate classes of the more favored sections of the city, such a vote by a given district will immediately cause its population to be subtracted from the sum total of the population on which the apportionment of saloons under the present law is made. That is, if Roxbury, Dorchester, Brighton and certain other districts should vote against the saloon, the police commissioners could not place within the districts not so voting the same number of saloons which the law now permits in the entire city. The details of this law have not been worked out yet, and until they are, and all the bearings of a by no means simple matter are before the public, it does not seem wise to advocate the plan unreservedly. It certainly is unjust to compel districts like Dorchester and Brighton to endure the saloon because of the preponderance of license votes in the wards of the old city, and we sincerely hope that a way to remedy this injustice will be found. On the other hand, the philanthropists at work in the North and West Ends naturally protest against any further massing of saloons in centers of population least able to resist temptation. Moreover, we can see how, under a general law not limited to Boston in its scope, the idea, if once accepted by our lawmakers, might prove to be quite destructive as well as constructive. If no-license wards in license cities can ask for local option, cannot license wards in no-license cities? At the same time it is everywhere becoming more and more apparent that the smaller the local unit that tries to enforce prohibition and the more homogeneous its population, the greater the chances of success.

Roman Catholics and Education.

If it be true, as is now affirmed, that Rev. Thomas J. Conaty of Worcester, Mass., has been selected by the pope as rector of the Catholic University, Washington, D. C., then an exceedingly able, forceful priest and broad-minded American citizen has been elevated to a post of great responsibility. Trained by the Jesuits and conservative in temper, his nomination and selection are a blow at the hopes of the liberal party in the church, which party founded the university and now sees the fruit of its toil and prayers pass into reactionary hands. Yet, after this is said, it must also be said that Rector Conaty will probably be as acceptable to Bishop Keane's friends as any man of his views could be. Protestants must deplore, even if they cannot feign surprise at, the victory of the ultramontanes at Rome and Leo's revulsion from his former favorites.

Whether the Roman Catholics of Canada have assented to the terms of the subjoined compromise on the Manitoba school question remains to be seen. The Manitoba government has, and the Montreal Daily Witness believes that "it removes all religious or sentimental grievances and at the same time leaves intact the national character of the schools." It is needless to add that, if this proves to be true, the Liberal ministry under Premier Laurier will have won a great victory. In essence these are the terms of the compromise: Religious instruction for half an hour may be authorized by a local school board or by petition of parents. Forty Catholic pupils in cities or towns, and twenty-five in rural districts, may have a certified Roman Catholic teacher. Where there are ten French-speaking pupils they shall be taught in French and English on the bilingual system.

The Situation in Turkey.

Sir Philip Currie seems to have compelled the Porte to deal justly with Rev. Mr. MacCallum, a British subject and A. B. C. F. M. missionary, who, dispensing relief at Marash, had been arrested by the Turks. The election of M. Ormanian as patriarch of the Armenians is thought by some to be a gain for the cause of reform, and M. Cambon, the French ambassador, points to it and other minor events as proof of the dawn of a new day and the essential concert of the Powers. But there is little real encouragement in these facts, and reports from individuals in Constantinople indicate that the crust on which society walks there is as thin as ever it was. Our fleet is still off Smyrna. The Bancroft has not entered the Dardanelles, and our just claims are ignored by the Porte.

Several months ago we noted the fact that the czar of Russia could not plead ignorance of the sentiment of Christendom respecting the heinousness of Turkey's treatment of Armenia, for he had had presented to him this summer a formal statement, signed by the leading ecclesiastics of Great Britain and America. Bishop Satterlee of Washington, D. C., the Protestant Episcopal prelate who visited St. Petersburg, secured an audience with the czar and laid before him the message of Protestant Christendom, has just disclosed some facts respecting his visit which deserve to be known far and wide. The signers of the petition were so numerous, and are so influential, that to name them would be to enumerate the greatest prelates, educators and missionary officials of the United States and Great Britain. Bishop Satterlee was received by the czar and czarina Aug. 5 and by the czar's mother on Aug. 7. "Although no response was made to the subject matter of the petition, and no manner of promise made," Bishop Satterlee feels that, "as he went in the name of Christ, so he was received." Unfortunately, the last time Russia interfered in behalf of the persecuted Christian subjects of the sultan Great Britain robbed her of the fruits of her chivalry and put Christian populations back where they were formerly, the spoil of Mussulmen. Great Britain is the Christian Power whose duty it is now to act, and that too in such a way as to convince Russia that her outcries against Turkish misrule are sincere.

The Famine in India.

Rev. R. A. Hume of Ahmednagar, writing Oct. 15, said that the outlook for nearly 300,000,000 people in India was very dark; that grain riots already were frequent; that parents were selling their children; that rain was not likely to fall for eight full months, and grain could not be ripened for ten months. Rev. Edward Hume, writing from Bombay about the same date, described the ravages of bubonic fever in that city and the dreary outlook for the natives. Dispatches from Bombay to London so late as Saturday last tell of rain falling last week in the district of Deccan, and the viceroy of India cables from Calcutta that considerable rain has recently fallen in the Madras and Bombay presidencies, and that consequently the price of wheat is falling and the outlook is brighter than it was a month ago when the missionaries looked forward to the worst famine that India had ever seen. But at best it will be a sad time, calling for heart-breaking sacrifices by the missionaries and lavish expenditure by the Indian Government. Russia, from motives that probably are mixed, is aiding in the work of relief, and is planning to give not only money but lower rates on grain purchased in Russia.

It was Archbishop Magee of York who divided preachers into three classes: those you can't listen to, those you can listen to and those you can't help listening to. He belonged to the last class.

IN BRIEF.

Our book number next week will indicate the extent and quality of the literature of the season and of the year, while editors and contributors will point out current drifts in reading and artistic circles.

Dr. Gladden this week says for us much that we have wished to say concerning social conditions and after-election responsibilities.

Prof. Barrett Wendell of Harvard is prescribing the King James Version of the Bible as a stimulant to his students of English composition. What condescension!

The present unfortunate plight of one of New England's college presidents is an impressive warning to young men of the unwisdom of indorsing notes. Read Prov. 6: 1–5.

The Jewish Messenger, with characteristic breadth of view and sympathy, calls the attention of its readers to our Armenian Orphans' Fund, and suggests that those who wish to show their sympathy for a persecuted people send their contributions to us.

The reader of the article on Commercial Morality in Japan in the November Nineteenth Century will arise from reading it saddened. If he be one interested in the recent developments at the Doshisha, he will understand some things better than he did before.

It is not possible to read the addresses given in the various meetings held to celebrate Dr. Storrs's jubilee by ministers, statesmen, jurists, editors and business men, without noting the influence of the great orator on the thought and style of those who eulogized him. Not a few of these speeches were themselves orations worthy to have been spoken by the hero of the occasion.

The late Archbishop of Canterbury had a favorite dog named Watch. Once, as he lay on the mat at the open door of the chapel, the archbishop read impressively this sentence of the Scripture lesson, "What I say unto you I say unto you all—watch." The dog sprang up, came forward and lay down before the reading desk at his master's feet. One hearer, at least, heeded the lesson and responded.

Mr. Bryan is probably without a rival in his feat of making 500 speeches in four months to crowded audiences. It is pertinent, however, to ask how large his audiences would have been if he had made them in one community. Does not the minister who makes 100 or more speeches in a year to the same people, and holds their interest for a series of years, sustain as great a test of oratory as did Mr. Bryan?

The Dayspring, Rev. Dr. J. G. Paton's missionary vessel, has sunk in the Pacific Ocean. The mails and three months' supplies for the New Hebrides mission went down with it. Many who remember the visit of that white-haired saint to this country will regret the loss of the ship he was so anxious to get, and some, we hope, will help him to get another. One lady in England has already contributed £1,000 toward a new Dayspring.

The secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, at the denominational missionary conference held in this city last week, admitted that this was a time of searching criticism of methods, and that it was useless for the missionary societies to expect to be exceptions or to escape such criticism, nor could larger receipts be expected until there was a return of unquestioning confidence in economy of administration and adaptation of the instrument to the work to be done.

The Boston Ministers' Meeting appointed a committee to arrange for a memorial meeting for Dr. Quint, because of his services to the denomination at large, and also to afford to the churches in Boston and vicinity to which he has ministered as occasional or stated supply opportunity to do honor to his memory. The committee has fixed on Dec. 7, at the noon hour, as the time of the meeting, which will be held in Park Street Church. Among the speakers will be Drs. Wellman, Lorimer and Little of Boston, Dr. William H. Ward of New York and President Tucker of Dartmouth College. All friends of Dr. Quint are invited to attend.

How near men may be to each other and yet how far apart is illustrated by the fact that Dr. Joseph Parker, the most noted Nonconformist preacher of London, had only once seen the late Archbishop of Canterbury, and that at a funeral of a distinguished person and mutual friend. Another case in point was the introduction in New York, the other day, of Ian Maclaren to Mr. Barrie. These famous latter-day novelists had to come across the ocean in order to establish a personal acquaintance, and it was fitting that the individual who presented the one to the other should have been their friend and discoverer, Dr. Robertson Nicoll.

Even the paper which Horace Greeley founded and which still stands for clean journalism is no longer able to resist in its Sunday edition the metropolitan craving for sensations and show. The Tribune now boldly proclaims a serio-comic colored art supplement, consisting of sixteen pages of wit, satire and humor. From the point of view of their contribution to literature, art, education, religion and, in fact, all the higher interests of mankind the New York Sunday papers as a class are worse than worthless, and we regret to see the Tribune being drawn into the maelstrom which has already swallowed up so many decent journalistic ideals.

A Chicago clergyman, Rev. Flavius J. Brobst, claims that the position taken by most of the ministers of the country in favor of the gold standard has alienated many people from the churches, and that it is necessary to establish a church where men of differing political views can hear the gospel. He therefore holds himself in readiness to be the preacher, and delivered his first sermon last Sunday morning. These self-styled churches for humanity are usually short-lived, but it is always in order to try to give the world a better representation of what the Church of Christ ideally is. Most of us, however, can do more toward bringing about that end by working in the churches to which we now belong.

When we spoke last week of the dignified character of most of the celebrations of the recent national victory not all the returns, especially from the newer sections of the country, were in. A letter before us from a pastor in a lumber region in the Northwest tells of a jollification "which was patriotic, inspiring and disgraceful at the same time." Half the town was, to put it mildly, merry, and our brother feels that too minute inquiry into the personnel of the jubilant throng might raise some serious problems of church discipline. He adds: "It is hard to be both gay and good in this community." That is a difficult feat anywhere and any time, East or West, election or no election.

Dr. George F. Pentecost, who had planned to visit India this winter, has accepted a call from the Presbyterian church of Yonkers, N. Y., and, if released by the Presbytery of London, will return to this country. He has frequently said that he regarded his present pastorate as an "interruption of his missionary work." Recently, addressing an assembly of Wesleyans, he remarked that he had preached the gospel ten years as a Congregationalist, he had also been a Baptist, and since he had been in England he had several times been offered ordination in the Church of England without re-examination. For all he knew he might pull up in the Wesleyan camp, and he had strong leanings towards the Salvation Army.

Rev. Dr. Alexander McLaren, for thirty-eight years pastor of Union Chapel, Manchester, recently said that his experience made him confident "that a Christian congregation will accept the plainest speaking and the most unflinching declaration of the faults of Christian character, if there be simple sincerity and kindliness under the plainness. . . . I am quite sure that a man's influence increases in geometric ratio with the length of his pastorate. . . . I do believe that if a man will stick to his study and his Bible, and take care never to give that which cost him nothing, but shear off superfluous work up and down the country everywhere, he will find out that he can go a great deal longer than he thought." These are the words of a great preacher and pastor.

Ian Maclaren has been called upon for numerous and varied services since he has been in this country, and we presume he has been obliged to say no to ninety-nine out of one hundred invitations. But one of the prettiest of the smaller functions in which he has participated must have been his naming of a reading circle of 100 young women at Knox College, Illinois. Upon this organization he bestowed the beautiful title, the Circle of the White Rose, and gave the following explanation of the name which he chose for his first and most famous book:

> The white rose was the symbol of the Jacobites. It was the lines from their song, "There grows a bonnie brier bush in our kail yard, and white are the blossoms out in our kail yard," that suggested the title to me. In Scotland the kail yard of any peasant can grow the white brier rose. There is a significance in this for you and me—with any surroundings, purity, goodness and truth, all of which are beautifully represented by the white rose, can flourish if desired and cared for.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM BOSTON.

The Bacchante Statue.

For reasons that are inscrutable the art commission of the city of Boston has reversed its decision, and now assents to the trustees of the Public Library accepting from Mr. McKim the gift of McMonnies bronze statue of a Bacchante, the same to remain where it now is, in the center of the fountain pool of the library courtyard. Inasmuch as there is such divergence of opinion respecting the success or failure of the technique of the statue, and since most of the artists who have seen it in its place deem it inappropriate, it would not seem necessary to add more. But unfortunately the statue is so placed that its qualities, other than artistic, have to be considered, and we challenge any one to take his stand where the crowd of spectators gathers, watch the expression on the faces of nine out of ten of the men who gaze upon it, and then affirm that a helpful, moral influence has been added to the sum total of the library's beneficence. For one Puritan that it will teach the delight of existence, there are hundreds of Cavaliers whom it will confirm in the exaltation of carnality. Abbey's pictures of the knight in search of the Holy Grail and McMonnies's statue of a priestess of Bacchus have nothing in common—save technical excellence—and the one should not be forced to have the other for a neighbor. This is more than a local matter of ephemeral interest. Boston's Public Library is the Mecca toward which the feet of pilgrims from all the world turn; and Boston's example still carries weight wherever men find themselves face to face with æsthetic and ethical problems.

That there is intense feeling of disapprobation respecting this matter was proved by the action of the Congregational Club last Monday evening. After a searching and convincing report had been read by the chairman of the outlook committee, Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., the following resolutions, introduced by Rev. C. M. Southgate, were passed unanimously and with emphatic earnestness:

> The Congregational Club of clergymen and laymen of Boston and vicinity desires respectfully to request the trustees of the Boston Public Library not to admit the statue of the Bacchante. We believe it out of keeping with the dignified architecture of the court and cloisters. But far more earnestly we protest against a representation of degrading impulses in such a spot. If the statue has any suggestion and significance, it is of base things, and if it has no meaning it has no right to a place. The lofty symbolic teachings of art within the building should not be contradicted and dishonored by a glorification of passions which education and morality seek to restrain and the law to crush. Vices which fill our prisons should not be exalted in our library.

A Daily Spiritual Privilege.

The noon meeting in Bromfield Street Church, held daily under the auspices of the Evangelistic Association of New England, has become a recognized institution in Boston. Business men and others find there spiritual help and stimulus to a deeper life. The meeting is unique in its management and conduct. The Association has large sources to draw from for leaders, and those are chosen who can sympathize with an audience of busy business men.

There is no stereotyped method of conducting the meeting and it is safe to say that many hundreds have been spiritually helped during the five years of its history. Up to the present time the meeting has been almost wholly supported by the daily free will offerings, and the amount raised in that way has been very gratifying, but generous contributions are now needed to place it upon a solid financial basis. When the wonderful results of the Fulton Street daily prayer meeting in New York city are recalled, the desirability of sustaining a similar center of noonday worship in the heart of the business section of Boston will be at once recognized.

Next Monday, Nov. 30, is the ninth anniversary of the Evangelistic Association. During the past nine years it has held meetings in 672 places. Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., will speak at the noon meeting that day on The Holy Spirit. In the evening H. M. Moore, Esq., and Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D., will speak in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church at the anniversary meeting.

Mr. Moody's Coming Visit.

The design of Mr. Moody's campaign, which begins with the Week of Prayer, Jan. 4, is not in any way to interfere with the usual work of the churches, but rather to stimulate and supplement it. For this reason meetings will be held in Tremont Temple only in the mornings and in the afternoons. Pastors may therefore arrange for their evening meetings in their own churches as if Mr. Moody were not in the vicinity at all, and yet their meetings will doubtless feel the spiritual impulse gathered from those which he will conduct. There is no objection to pastors having other evangelists in their own churches if they so desire. This is the plan on which Mr. Moody is now working in New York with such admirable results.

Getting Acquainted with Boston.

The Social Science Open Court is a body of modern peripatetics composed of ministers and laymen of all denominations who have a bent towards sociology. They are endeavoring to solve certain problems, not by the study of books, but by a series of clinics. Guided by their leader, Rev. I. C. Tomlinson, they investigated the North End last week, and after partaking of an Italian dinner learned that "New Italy" was really not so bad a place to live in after all. Schoolmasters and representatives of the clergy, one of the latter being a Jewish rabbi, spoke of existing conditions and as the contrast was made between the former days, when crime seemed to be indigenous to this quarter of our city, and the present with its marked improvement, the missionary work received its full share of recognition. Chinatown is the next objective point, when spaghetti will give place to chop soy eaten in a Chinese restaurant, and the subject for discussion will be Restricted Immigration. ☞

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Meeting of the W. C. T. U. at St. Louis.

This annual gathering was attended by about 500 delegates from all parts of the country. Miss Frances Willard presided, and in her annual address called attention to the principle of prohibition as the only principle for the organization to follow, and yet recognized the fact that in the recent presidential campaign the silver question was uppermost. She expressed her affection both for the defeated candidate and the president elect, and was inclined to be optimistic as to the advance which Prohibitionists have made. General satisfaction was felt over the result of the election. The reported decision of Mr. and Mrs. McKinley to have no wine in the White House during the next administration was heartily approved. Mrs. M. B. Carse obtained more than $140,000 toward the debt on the Woman's Temple, Chicago, and will try to obtain $160,000 the coming year, and thus secure the control of the building. Miss Willard, of course, was re-elected president, and the old officers were also largely retained. Altogether the gathering was one of real enthusiasm and hopefulness.

End of the Vrooman Case.

Dr. H. W. Thomas announced in connection with the service at the People's Church last Sunday morning that hereafter Mr. Vrooman would be associated with himself as pastor of the church, and for the next four or five months would preach in his place. Dr. Thomas added that owing to failing health he felt it impossible to do all the work which the prosperous organization of which he is the head demands. He proposes to escape the severity of the winter by going south and will take advantage of his trip to preach in various Southern cities. While Dr. Thomas was making this announcement to his people, Mr. Vrooman was resigning his charge in Kenwood and giving the reasons why he could no longer remain pastor of a Presbyterian church and why he especially desired to enter into partnership with Dr. Thomas in the care of the People's Church. It is said that a good many of the larger givers in the Kenwood church will follow Mr. Vrooman, but it is altogether probable that more will enter into the church now that its character is established than will leave it. The Kenwood church has extended a call to Dr. John Henry Barrows, who is now abroad, with reasonable hope of its acceptance.

An Excellent Program.

There were two attractions this week at the Ministers' Meeting. The first was an account by Rev. Amos Dresser of Nebraska of his early experiences in the founding of Lane Seminary, Oberlin College, and of his association with such men as Dr. Lyman Beecher and Asa Mahan. At the request of many present he gave an account of his arrest, trial and sentence to receive twenty lashes on the bare back in the public square, Nashville, Tenn., in 1837, for his supposed anti-slavery opinions. Mr. Dresser had circulated no anti-slavery documents, was in the South for his health and to sell copies of the well known Cottage Bible, but as certain suspicious letters were found in his trunk, which was opened and examined in his presence, and in a diary written in short hand, which was also supposed to be anti-slavery, the court could do no less than sentence him to the disgrace of a public flogging and banishment from the State within twenty-four hours. What a contrast to the invitation sent last year to the American Missionary Association to hold its jubilee meeting this year in the city of Nashville! And this invitation was signed by the officials of the city. Father Dresser is hale and hearty and hard at work in his home missionary field although between eighty and ninety years of age. The second attraction was an unusually well-considered paper by Rev. J. M. Campbell on Ministerial Temptations. It was remarkable for the frankness with which these temptations were described. One is the temptation to laziness, due to the fact that ministers control their time and are responsible to no one but themselves. There are also other temptations to effeminacy, to self indulgence, to spiritual pride, to dogmatism, to worldly ambition, to professional envy and jealousy, to the seeking of popularity rather than power and to an officialism in religion.

Sunday-School Convention.

The half-yearly meeting of the superintendents and teachers of Cook County was held Tuesday in the First Church, Chicago. The question discussed was, How much ought we to invest in our Sunday school? The first address was by Mr. Pierson, superintendent of the First Church, Oak Park, who said that he had found it necessary to invest thought, time, prayer, special preparation for the duties of his office and never to call his teachers together without having a definite and well-considered plan to present to them. He had also found it possible by having a rally day to secure an attendance of 100 per cent. in eighteen out of sixty classes in his school, and in the three Bible classes an attendance of from fifty to 100 in each class. Rev. W. F. McMillen spoke of the great work which Mrs. Bryner, recently superintendent of the primary department of the Union Park Sunday school, is now doing through teachers' institutes and of the enthusiasm her methods of teaching are arousing, even among teachers of other denominations than our own. The remaining time was devoted to short addresses, which were all the more pithy and interesting for being short. The hospitality of the First Church was bountiful and hearty. Long experience has made the ladies of this old church adepts in the treatment of guests.

A Week of Conventions.

Wednesday, Thursday and Friday the National Gospel Mission Union held its annual gathering with the First Church. This is a convention of city mission workers, helping hand missionaries, managers of different forms of charity, and all that kind of work which, while sustained by the churches almost entirely and performed by church members, is yet under the authority of no particular church. It is a conference of those who are seeking to reach the lowly, to purify and abolish the slums, to discover the best methods of dispensing material aid to the needy, of dealing with tramps, of managing social settlements. The work of the Y. M. C. A, the W. C. T. U., the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the Chicago Commons, the Hull House, the Volunteers, Rescue Missions, the Bible Institute and Colportage was represented. Men like Dr. Goodwin, W. E. Blackstone, Harry Monroe, Brigadier-General Fielding, Rev. R. A. Torrey, Graham Taylor, and the superintendents of missions for relief in the cities of Peoria, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Columbus, Denver, Minneapolis, Memphis took part in the discussion. Facts were brought out of great interest and suggestions made which cannot fail to be of much value to those engaged in the work represented.

Wednesday evening the Epworth League began a two days' session in the Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church, Chicago. This convention was also of deep interest and far-reaching influence. We have had at the Bible Institute a three days' convention of the officers and missionaries of the American Sunday School Union, F. G. Ensign, superintendent. The attendance was large. Rev. Mr. Torrey, Dr. A. T. Pierson and Rev. H. T. Sell were among the speakers.

At Evanston the presidents of the Methodist colleges of the country have been discussing the question of education and the possibility of securing better methods in the management of their institutions. As it was decided, one might almost say, while these educators were in session, to close Jennings Seminary at Aurora after a life of forty years, and to close it on account of lack of patronage, it is not strange that it was the unanimous opinion of the presidents that the Methodist Church has too many schools and colleges under its care, and that they should recommend the consolidation of some of them and the improvement of them all. Thursday the educators of the United States began a two days' session in the Auditorium, at which some of the problems connected with education were earnestly discussed. The liberals have this week been studying the problems of religion from their point of view at Indianapolis, where papers have been read, sermons delivered and addresses made by such men as Rev. R. R. Bulkley of the Unity Church, Chicago, Jenkins Lloyd Jones of All Souls' Church, Dr. H. W. Thomas, and Dharmapala of India. The Inter Seminary Missionary Alliance, in session at the University of Chicago, has been of a more enthusiastic character than any in recent years. The addresses of Prof. Graham Taylor and Sec. H. D Wiard were especially effective.

Chicago, Nov 21. FRANKLIN.

After the Election.

By Rev. Washington Gladden, D. D.

We are now far enough away from the noise and smoke of the late political conflict to gather up its results and make some estimate of the shape in which it has left us and the sums which it has set for us.

There is profound reason, to begin with, for thankfulness and pride in the good order and good temper with which the popular verdict has been received. Not a ripple of resistance, not an act of violence, not a finger lifted in all this land to challenge a result which, to great multitudes, was bitterly unwelcome. There were rumors before election of probable outbreaks, but some of us resented the suggestion; we believed that the people would abide the issue loyally, whatever it might be. Our faith has been justified. And it must not be forgotten that the credit of this self-restraint is all due to the defeated party. Those who have exhibited such moderation in the hour of a sore defeat cannot be anarchists or rioters. Mistaken they may be in some of their financial opinions, but their conduct proves them to be pretty good Americans.

Another reason for congratulation is that the victory is not a triumph of sectionalism. There is neither a solid South nor a solid West. States in the southern belt, on the Pacific slope, in the far northwest are on the side of the majority.

It is a cause for rejoicing, also, that the victory cannot be attributed to the coercion of corporations or employers. That something of this element may have entered into the contest I do not doubt, and the counsels given to working men to abdicate their manhood for the sake of keeping their jobs were among the most questionable utterances of the campaign, but there is not much evidence that they were either needed or heeded. It is evident, at any rate, that the farmers of Iowa and Minnesota and the Dakotas and Oregon were not intimidated, and there is no reason to doubt that the working men of the cities, as a class, voted as independently as the farmers did.

From those who were defeated in this campaign, as well as from those who were victorious, the country now expects a patriotic co-operation in all things that make for peace and welfare. An era of prosperity seems to be dawning. The great majority of business men expect it, and that faith will bring it. The want of that faith has been the chief recent impediment to its return. But the complete restoration of prosperity requires the united endeavor of all classes. To obstruct such a result for political purposes would be a crime akin to poisoning wells or setting harvest fields on fire. I have no fear that any considerable numbers of the defeated party will put themselves in such an unsocial attitude. With all the rest they will welcome returning prosperity, no matter though it may confound their predictions.

Upon the victorious party, however, rests the responsibility. In the first place, it must recognize the principle laid down by Jefferson in his first inaugural, that the minority has rights which must be respected and claims which must not be ignored. The minority has grievances which the majority must study and seek to redress. Never was there a fight as hot as this has been in which there was not something to fight for on both sides. Anybody who thinks that five or six millions of Americans would stand together, contending for so many months as sturdily as these have stood and contended, for a cause that had no substance of justice in it, has an imperfect understanding of human nature. As to measures and remedies these men may have been mistaken. As to the existence of conditions which needed to be changed, they were not mistaken. We may doubt whether they can rightly define their grievances. They only know that the harness galls, that the burden is crushing them, and they are reaching out rather blindly for some relief.

That something can be done by legislation to improve financial conditions I do not doubt. Great questions here confront the people in power—questions that will call for sober and heroic treatment. In the solution of these they ought to have the help of all men of good will without distinction of party.

Deeper than this the probe must go. The burdens of all our governments—national, State, municipal—are far heavier than they ought to be, and by careless legislation and corrupt administration a disproportionate share of these burdens falls on the producing classes. The taxes of the lower, middle and working classes are far heavier, in proportion to their ability, than those of the rich. This is due in part to defective systems of taxation, but in larger measure to the evasion of taxes by the prosperous and to rascally connivance at such evasion on the part of public officers. An enormous tribute is levied upon the community by railroad properties fraudulently administered, by over-capitalization and by the giving away of valuable franchises which ought to be held for the people. All this falls heavily on the producing classes. Something of this they are beginning to understand, and their wrath is rising. It is a matter from which their attention will not again be diverted, and those who are responsible for our laws and their administration may as well make a note of this. We have made the path of plunderers far too smooth and wide. We have suffered the strong to prey upon the weak. Grave injustices have crept in and intrenched themselves in our laws and our policies. In such conditions it is always the humbler classes who are the chief sufferers. The time arrives when they become aware of the injury they are suffering, and their protest is apt to be made in a blind and brutal fashion. Let us hope that there is intelligence and conscience enough in this country to take hold of these oppressive conditions and right what is wrong in them before it is too late. If there is any statesmanship among the victors in this contest, here is their opportunity.

Nevertheless I am convinced that the social distresses out of which we now seem to be emerging are not all the fruit of bad legislation or corrupt politics. I do not believe that the most or the worst of them can be explained in this way. There are evils that may be reformed or averted by legislation, but our deepest troubles do not arise from tariff or want of tariff, from any defects or deficiencies of currency, nor even from rascally officials or oppressive combinations of capital. Industrial depressions like that through which we have been passing may be aggravated by some or all of these causes, but if all these maladjustments were corrected by angelic wisdom we should still, unless the habitual thoughts and tempers of the people were changed, find ourselves periodically plunging into that Slough of Despond in which for three years we have been so miserably wallowing. The real causes of industrial collapse and stagnation are the abuse of credit and the reckless extravagance of the people. The great majority of us are habitually living beyond our means, anticipating our income, running in debt for a good share of our enjoyments. This begins on the boulevards and goes down to the slums. Many of the poorest people are all the while running in debt, on the installment plan, for goods that they can never pay for. Business, too, is conducted more and more on a basis of highly inflated credit; in their haste to be rich men take enormous risks with borrowed capital. The worst of it is that they are apt to imagine that they are already rich, because they have this money in their hands which is not their own, and they begin at once to live luxuriously on other people's money. Such seeming wealth gives them financial standing and enables them to borrow more. All this makes business brisk and gives the appearance of great prosperity. This is what we call a boom. But, by and by, to all these borrowers and debtors, high and low, a pay day must come. The lenders and the creditors begin to be uneasy and to demand their own. Then comes the stringency, the stagnation, the inevitable collapse of credit, the long, dreary days of anxiety and suffering, when the mill wheels stop and the freight trains cease running, and throngs of the unemployed gather in the streets and little children are pale with hunger. Such a result as this follows as inevitably from extravagant living and reckless abuse of credit as any other effect follows its cause. If we think that we can cure such troubles as these by gold or silver or fiat money, by protection or free trade, we are reckoning without our host. In spite of everything that we can do by law these periodic depressions will return; and the period is likely to be shorter and shorter because we are driving our credit at a more and more killing pace.

Is there no remedy? Yes, and it is perfectly simple, so simple that nobody will apply it. All the great remedies are simple. If we could be content with slower gains, if we could curb our mad passion to get rich in a hurry, if we were willing to live more quietly and less ostentatiously, if we could be satisfied with frugal pleasures, if we could make up our minds to earn our cake before eating it, these devastating depressions would not return to plague us. There would be fewer booms, no doubt; the tale of mushroom cities and of inflated industries would be shortened, the palaces would not rise so fast upon the avenues and buttoned lackeys and short-tailed horses might fade from view. But we could well endure some diminution of the vulgar wealth that flaunts its tawdry splendors in our faces if thereby we might escape the miseries of these periodic depressions. No man can compute the injury which the nation suffers at such a time. To many the want of food and fire brings a lowering of vitality and a reduction of strength for the battle of life. Tens of thousands are hurried down the fatal incline into mendicancy, a pit from which few that fall into it are ever rescued, and in the minds of many more dark and misanthropic tempers are engendered which greatly weaken the social bond. The losses that we suffer in these hard times are not all reported by the commercial agencies; the most disastrous failures are seen in the wreckages of character and the disintegration of society.

There is no need of distress or want in this great country. All who would work might have plenty if we could only moderate our desires and live within our means, and be content, in all our gettings, to make haste slowly. A sober mind, a spirit unvexed with the torment of covetousness—these will cure our worst social ills, and nothing else will cure them. Our deepest need is not more or less of tariff, it is not bimetallism, nor gold nor silver monometallism—some of these might slightly mitigate our miseries, but the relief would be short-lived—what we most need is a better mind, a more adequate view of the meaning of life.

LETTER FROM JAPAN.

A Political Shake-up.

Following close upon the great physical disturbances in eastern and central Japan, a political convulsion of almost equal magnitude has shaken the land and disturbed the dreams and prophecies of many. After four years of remarkable service the Ito cabinet has fallen. The causes of the catastrophe were financial inability and a weak foreign policy. The "bowl of the premier" was handed about from one statesman to another and was finally accepted by Count Matsukata, after he had twice declined it. He is generally considered the ablest financier in the country.

That stalwart statesman, the James G. Blaine of Japanese politics and implacable foe of the last cabinet, Count Okuma, takes the portfolio of foreign affairs. Marquis Saigo, navy, and Viscount Takashima, formerly colonization, now war and colonization, are the only members of the Ito cabinet who remain in office. The new combination has been dubbed the bicycle cabinet, Satsuma being the big front wheel and Count Okuma the back one. It is certainly surprising that six out of eleven portfolios should be taken by men from Satsuma province and still more so that all the offices but three should be filled with Kyushu men. It would seem to be a political blunder. But no one expects the new cabinet to remain long in office. There is almost no possibility that it can command a majority of the diet to be convened in November. But, on the whole, the change is a step forward, especially in the line of responsible party government. It is stated that Count Okuma will inaugurate shortly a more vigorous policy in Korea, and all foreign nations are likely to be called upon to pay a little more respect than hitherto to Japan's wishes. It is pleasant to note in this connection that all the old treaties with foreign nations are now revised except four, those with Spain, Portugal, Austria and Switzerland.

Parcels Post.

Another international step forward is now accomplished. On Oct. 1 a parcels post system between this country and Great Britain went into effect. It almost makes an American turn green with envy to think of being able to send about three pounds of express matter from here to any part of England for eighty-seven sen. Why does the great republic lag so far behind on some of these useful reforms?

A Heroic Act.

The papers record that a well-to do farmer rose to the emergency recently when, owing to floods, the bank of a certain river threatened to give way. The neighborhood rallied to mend the dike, but earth was scarce and time pressing. The generous, quick-witted man threw open the doors of his warehouse and bade the farmers use his bags of rice. Twelve hundred of these were sacrificed in a trice and the danger averted. A farmer near this city of Okayama recently performed a similar service, using bags of wheat to stop a threatened break.

China's Foremost Statesman.

Li Hung Chang, the noble old Roman of modern Chinese history, whose recent trip around the world was one continued fête, passed in and out of Yokohama Harbor on a recent Sunday, on his way to Tientsin. He refused to trust himself on the shore of the country where a dastardly attempt on his life was made two years ago. It was a terrible but well-deserved blow to the pride of sensitive Japan, a whole nation doing penance for the mad act months before of one of its members. The eminent surgeon who attended him when he was shot at Shimonoseki, an officer from the imperial court, cabinet ministers and other high officials or prominent merchants called upon him on board the steamer, and everything Japan was allowed to do in his honor was handsomely done. As if to stamp imperial disapproval still more markedly upon the ill treatment awarded Li on his former visit to Japan, the emperor has personally rewarded the two members of the police force who specially guarded the distinguished visitor during his few hours' stay in Yokohama Harbor.

Eclectic Religion.

A recent admirable journalistic summary of the religious press in Japan shows very clearly the great haziness of present day writers on the subject of personality. Several Japanese scholars who aspire to be leaders in the realm of philosophical speculation either deny altogether the need of religion for men of intelligence, or reduce God, heaven and all ethical truth to a mere subjective conception, while they sink self and all hope of a future existence into the continued life of society as a whole. Happily such views never win general assent in a progressive, practical age. A general conference of representatives of different religions was held the other day in Tokyo. There were present two Shintoists, eighteen Buddhists, sixteen Christians, six free religionists and five others. The large majority of those representing Christianity were past or present Kumiai, but there were one or two Presbyterians and one Greek Catholic, as well as one foreign missionary, Clay MacCauley, the Unitarian.

There was a free interchange of views and no party showed signs of yielding to others. Said one of the Shintoists: "Let us remember that we all represent important parts in the body of new Japan's religion. Buddhism the bones, Confucianism the flesh, Christianity the blood and Shintoism the brains. Did Mr. Shibata forget that the blood is the life and did he unconsciously, like Caiaphas of old, utter a true prophecy of Japan's future religion? This pan-religious gathering doubtless accomplished something toward bringing nearer together thinkers of different schools, but whether it really furthered the true interests of God's spiritual kingdom opinions differ widely, and only the future can disclose. Nearly all the aggressive, evangelical leaders and papers of Christian Japan distrust the movement and some criticise it severely. A similar gathering is to be held after this twice a year. My own personal conviction is that it will do no serious harm, but that it is not worth the time and effort it costs.

Salvation Army.

This vigorous religious organization, the youngest and liveliest of some thirty Christian sects in Japan, has just celebrated the first anniversary of its arrival in this country. It reports some 609 conversions in Tokyo and Yokohama alone and a volunteer army of 150 soldiers. There are already seventeen Japanese officers, four of them holding the rank of captain. The Japanese War Cry has risen in nine months to a circulation of 1,750 copies, and is entirely self-supporting. This is certainly a remarkable showing. The foreign missionaries live on ridiculously small salaries and show great devotion, even a dramatically unselfish spirit and earnestness. It would be easy to criticise them in some things, but thus far, with all their extravagances, they have proved an able ally to the Christian forces in Japan.

The Doshisha.

The trustees of the Kyoto school are plucky to the point of rashness. They are trying to run the school without the aid of foreign teachers. The real test will come after Jan. 1, when the foreign subsidy ceases and students have had a chance to show whether they are satisfied with what instruction the school is able to give on its reduced income. Official statistics are not yet to hand, but report says the upper classes are small, and there are but four students in the theological department and very few, if any, in the other university departments. There is a good number of younger students, and as the preparatory department has been extended—lower—two years, and the whole grade of the school purposely lowered, the total number of students does not fall much, if any, below the figures of last summer's term. The committee of the alumni, who labored to bring about a reconciliation between the trustees and the missionaries, are just now quiescent, evidently feeling it hopeless to make further effort until the trustees have found out more definitely by sweet or bitter experience what they can and what they cannot accomplish unaided from abroad.

General Outlook.

The missionaries, thus freed from school duties, are throwing themselves into direct evangelistic work, and extended tours from Hokkaido to Hyuga are the order of the season. There is no marked lifting of the clouds of depression, but a patient, plodding, practical, prayerful spirit is showing itself more and more among the churches as a bow of promise that cheers all hearts and quickens every activity done in the name of discipleship.

The Fifty Years' Pastorate of Rev. Dr. Richard S. Storrs.

An Elaborate and Joyous Celebration of the Occasion.

The jubilee anniversary of Dr. Storrs's installation as pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn is a notable landmark in the history of Congregationalism. His congregation, his ministerial brethren and his fellow-citizens appreciate its significance and have honored it worthily. The man and his work have been for the last ten days the most prominent theme in Brooklyn newspapers, an absorbing topic of conversation and a matter of profound interest to multitudes, only a small proportion of whom were able to participate in the demonstrations of respect and affection made to Dr. Storrs in the various ways which loyal and loving devotion could invent and prepare.

The celebration of the anniversary was of course initiated by the Church of the Pilgrims, but they have extended generous invitations to their pastor's friends and their own to share in it, while various other organizations have claimed the privilege of paying their tributes of esteem and honor to the foremost of American preachers and orators.

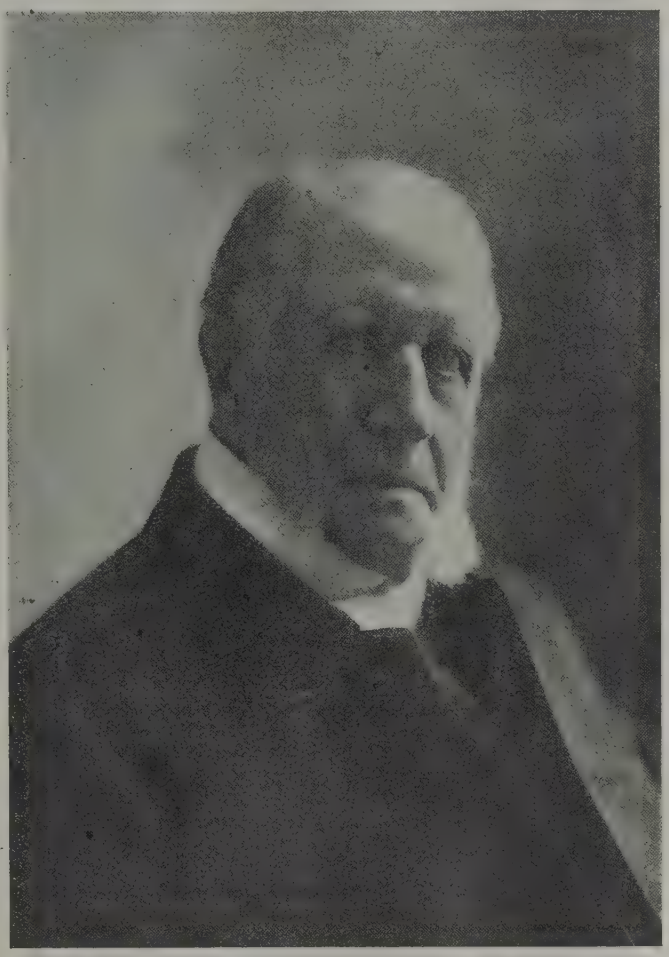
THE ANNIVERSARY SERMON.

The series of services fittingly began with a discourse delivered by Dr. Storrs to his people, Sunday, Nov. 15, reviewing his fifty years' pastorate. His text was 1 Tim. 1: 11—"According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust." He summarized the work and the changes of the church, of which he has been the only pastor, from its beginning. It has received into its membership 2,593 persons, of which 846 remain as resident members. Its mission work in connection with Pilgrim Chapel, in charge of Rev. E. H. Byington, includes a Sunday school of more than 1,000. The general contributions of the congregation, aside from the maintenance of their own work, have amounted to more than a million and a half of dollars, besides large individual gifts not reckoned. The changes among the churches in Brooklyn were noted, the development of the Congregational denomination and the growth of the country. The trend of religious thought and feeling in other denominations was indicated. The advance of the secular spirit was described and deprecated. Then Dr. Storrs thus characterized his ministry:

> My steadfast and animating aim has been to bring an influence from the realms celestial, declared to us through Christ, to act on the minds and hearts, on the spirit and the conduct, of those to whom my ministry has been rendered; so that life, by God's grace, should be ennobled in them and in myself, and souls made in his image be lifted to closer fellowship with him. That sums up all that I have consciously sought to do, for all these years, in the pulpit or in pastoral service; and in that relation I have tried to be a faithful and an untiring minister for God.

This statement he followed by a comprehensive declaration of his religions belief, of which Jesus Christ is the central fact. His supernatural birth, his life manifesting God to men, his cross, resurrection, ascension and assurance of coming again to reign in righteousness, form the substance and splendor of the glorious gospel of the blessed God. To this gospel Dr. Storrs gave the testimony of his personal experience and his unwavering faith after proclaiming it for fifty years.

The audience which crowded the church listened to the sermon with rapt attention.



DR. STORRS'S MOST RECENT PICTURE

It was a magnificent demonstration of unabated intellectual vigor and growing spiritual power crowning this long pastorate. In its conception of the Christian ministry, of the changes of half a century in thought and purpose and in material things, of the substance of the gospel, of the whole range of Christian theology and of its application to human experience it will stand unrivaled in its time. It is the sum of fifty years' experience, meditation, prayer and service of a most eminent, yet humble, minister of Jesus Christ.

THE LOVING CUP.

The Manhattan Association of Congregational Ministers has from its beginning looked up to Dr. Storrs as its leader, and has received from him a generous share of his time and thought. Its members, with their wives and invited guests, gave him a reception on Monday evening, Nov. 16, at the Clinton Avenue Church, whose pastor, Dr. T. B. McLeod, presided at the banquet which followed. Many eminent clergymen of various denominations were present. The special feature was the presentation to Dr. Storrs of a loving cup. It has three handles, is in the shape of a pulpit of ancient pattern, is ten inches high and weighs ninety-four ounces. On the body of the cup is the inscription, "Sermo animi est imago qualis vir talis est orator est." Its ornamentation includes the water lily, the symbol of eloquence; the ivy, signifying true friendship; the open Book, the design of a heart of charity and good cheer and the blossoms of the mayflower. Three panels on the sides present a view of the Church of the Pilgrims, the letters R. S. S. in monogram and the presentation inscription. Love of men for a man has rarely found so profound, so joyous and so felicitous expression as in the presentation of this cup. Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist and Episcopal pastors followed one another with addresses which filled the time till nearly midnight. The presentation was made by Dr. A. J. Lyman, and his expression of the cumulative affection of many personal friends for many years, President Patton's discriminating and appreciative analysis of Dr. Storrs's character, Dr. Herrick's exalted conception of the ideal Christian leader realized, and Dr. Cuyler's description of the great-hearted preacher were impressive illustrations of many-sided views of the central figure brought out by warm hearts and eloquent lips. Dr. Storrs's response to Dr. Lyman's presentation speech was as humorous as felicitous, including apt stories which evoked great laughter and concluding with these words, which were followed by a moment's silence and then by enthusiastic applause:

> Brethren, reverently let me say, with all openness of my heart, I trust that by and by we shall every one of us, not in the earthern vessel, however beautiful that may be, but in the heavenly chalice, drink the new wine together in the kingdom of the Father with our Saviour, the Son.

THE CELEBRATION BY THE CHURCH.

Dr. Storrs's people chose their own method of testifying to their unbounded loyalty to their pastor. Their church paper, The Pilgrim, edited by Rev. E. H. Byington, appeared in a sumptuous cover, with a picture of the edifice in gilt. Several sketches of the pastor in his various offices and work, a history of the church and portraits of Dr. Storrs and the church officers filled its pages. A reception was given to Dr. and Mrs. Storrs on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 19. The programs were elegantly printed in gold letters. The parlors were splendidly decorated with a wealth of yellow chrysanthemums, roses and evergreens from the conservatories of Joseph E. Brown, Esq., one of the prominent members of the church. The pastor and his wife stood under a magnificent floral arch, where for more than two hours a constant procession moved past them with words of greeting. Among the guests, beside many prominent citizens of Brooklyn and New York, were Drs. J. E. Twitchell and C. R. Palmer of New Haven, S. L. Blake of New London, Lewellyn Pratt of Norwich, Pres. M. E Gates of Amherst, D. L. Furber of Newton, Mass., W. E. Park of Gloversville, N. Y., and many other clergymen and educators, besides a large number of former members of the church now living in other places. Mrs. Storrs was presented with three elegant pieces of gold plate from the ladies of the congregation, and in the public addresses of the evening tributes to her service and devotion to the people were as emphatic as those to her husband.

A very large audience assembled in the church on Thursday evening. Mr. George P. Stockwell presided. A festival hymn was sung, which was written by Dr. Richard Storrs Willis on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the installation of Dr. Storrs's father at Braintree, Mass. Rev. Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall of the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, spoke for the neighboring churches, Rev. Dr. John Hall for the churches in New York city, Prof. George P. Fisher of Yale University for the Congregational churches in New England and Rev. Dr. R. R. Meredith for the Congregational churches in Brooklyn. The final address to Dr. Storrs was by Mr. J. E. Brown for the people of the Church of the Pilgrims. While all the addresses vibrated with tender feeling, which showed the strength of personal friendships joined with the appreciation of Dr. Storrs's public service, this last was truly representative of what could be felt for a pastor only by those who have long enjoyed his ministry. For the living and the dead Mr. Brown spoke the words made fitting by long experience of the wise and unfailing pastoral care which has blessed the families of two generations. The address was accompanied by the gift from the congregation of a check for $5,000. It was also made known that $20,000 had been raised for improvements in the church edifice.

Dr. Storrs's response was characteristic. With restrained emotion and faultless diction he referred to their history together and what it had taught them of God and duty and Christian privilege and the immortal life. He declared that his indebtedness to the church was far greater than theirs to him. He concluded by saying that he had never felt so profoundly humble and so grateful as within the last few days. He said:

I thank you, ministers; I thank you, citizens. Most of all, my dear people, I give thanks to you and for you unto God, to whom my gratitude is genuinely and supremely due for your kindness and for the fact that you have trained me for his service as no school could have done, and that you have blessed me with your steadfastness and your confidence during all the time that I have been with you. And so God bless you all.

THE CHILDREN'S SERVICE

Last Sunday afternoon special services were held in the church for the two Sunday schools. Besides the address of the pastor, fitting words were spoken by S. B Chittenden, Esq., and Rev. E. H. Byington, who was also the author of the jubilee hymn which was sung by the congregation. After the anthem, Suffer Little Children, was sung, fifty of the youngest ones, from both schools, marched up the aisle, each holding a golden chrysanthemum, one for each year. Every one of them had been baptized by Dr. Storrs. They gathered round the baptismal font where he stood and gave him the flowers. He spoke to them with tender affection and blessed them.

OTHER MEETINGS.

These distinctively religious assemblies which we have here reported in this unique celebration were not more notable than the social gatherings held for the same purpose. On Tuesday of last week Dr. Storrs was the guest of the Hamilton Club, when eloquent addresses on his services as a citizen were made by distinguished men of Brooklyn. This week Monday he was the guest of the Congregational Club of that city, and on Tuesday evening there was a great meeting of his fellow-citizens in the Academy of Music, at which Gen. Stewart L. Woodford presided and addresses were made by Pres. Seth Low, Hon. Joseph H. Choate and others.

THE LOVING CUP.

CURRENT HISTORY NOTES.

The death of Sir B. W. Richardson removes the most eminent English authority on hygiene and an able advocate of temperance.

The treasury of the city of New York is $100 richer, as the result of the stricken conscience of one moved to repentance at one of Mr. Moody's gospel meetings last week.

The Knights of Labor in session last week, led by Mr. Sovereign, made the free coinage of silver at a sixteen to one ratio a plank in its platform, but the Chicago Federation of Labor last Sunday tabled a similar declaration.

Governor Wolcott of Massachusetts will do well in appointing a member of the Board of Railroad Commissioners to succeed the late Mr. Dale, if he selects a man who will put a right estimate on the value of Sunday as a day of rest.

Hampton Institute was the scene of a gathering last week the most notable in its history probably. President Gilman of Johns Hopkins University, Hon. J. L. M. Curry, agent of the Slater Fund, Booker Washington of Tuskegee, President Burnstead of Atlanta University, Hamilton W. Mabie and others equally noted were present to witness the opening of the new building, given by Morris K. Jessup, to be used as a trade school and to be supported in part by the Slater Fund. Many black and white Southerners were present to show their sympathy with the educational ideals of Hampton.

The revelations of the past week respecting the dishonesty of one of the wealthiest and most influential citizens of New Hampshire are startling, yet not surprising when one examines the methods of the guilty man, the credulity of his victims and the laxity of the State law. How many more such catastrophes will New Hampshire tolerate before she revises her law governing savings bank investments? How many more such illustrations will ecclesiastical and philanthropic organizations need to show them the unwisdom of committing to any one man the duty of investing trust funds?

Mayor Strong has named seven new members of New York city's Board of Education, five of whom can be counted upon to vote with the reformers, hence the balance of power now rests with the progressive element. Maryland's Supreme Court has sustained Mayor Hooper of Baltimore in his determination to save that city from Republican spoils-seekers. A petition is circulating in Boston, and already has found many signers among its merchants and professional men, which calls upon the commissioners empowered to settle who shall use the new subway and upon what terms they shall use it, to give a public hearing to those who insist that such a valuable monopoly shall not be given away or assigned on terms that do not insure adequate recompense to society.

Bishop Potter of New York asks: Who is to continue the "campaign of education" in our great cities? and he is broad minded enough to answer: Not the ecclesiastics of his own or any other church, but the workers in our college settlements, concerning whom he says:

This is, verily, work among the foundations; and it is being done by men and women whose character, spirit and methods deserve the highest honor and are worthy of the widest imitation. To give these brave souls, who are illustrating in the finest way the temper and the service of the modern chivalry, means sufficient for their work may well be the grateful privilege of those for whose well-being, in a very real sense, they are working, quite as much as for theirs among whom they work. If any human agency is to reach, persuade and enlighten the multitudes in our great cities with whom, finally, so largely rests the choice of our rulers, the stability of the republic and the progress of our civilization, I am increasingly persuaded that it is that which has shown itself to be inspired by a spirit so heroic and distinguished by methods so singularly wise and so exceptionally successful.

Of many recent judicial opinions that of Judge Baker of the United States Court for the district of Indiana is most notable, because of its unflinching, unswerving thrust at the heart of one of the most extortionate and reprehensible of our trusts—the nail trust. Listen to the judge's words:

This trust has, by bribery and intimidation, prevented the wire-nail machine manufacturing company of Anderson, Ind., from carrying out a contract lawfully entered into with the plaintiff to furnish them forty wire-nail machines. This action on their part directly affects the interstate commerce between the State of Indiana and the State of Ohio and falls within the very letter of the anti-trust law of July 2, 1890. There is no doubt in my mind that such a combination is illegal and that its purposes are violative of sound public policy. The common law expressly forbids the organization of such combinations, composed of numerous corporations or firms. They are dangerous to the peace and good order of society and they arrogate to themselves the exercise of powers destructive of the right of free competition in the markets of the country, and by their aggregate power and influence imperil the free and pure administration of justice.

The latest news respecting this trust is that it is disintegrating, as so many others have, because of its very excesses.

All who divide, and keep divided, nations and churches, and families and friends, in order to make a name, or a living or a party, or just a despite for themselves out of such divisions, they are the true seed of Jeroboam. —Rev. Alexander Whyte, D. D.

The Home

AN INTERLUDE.

When storm and the wind grow colder,
When night and the frost, made bolder,
Crowd down the lowering skies,
Sweet Summer looks over her shoulder
As into the south she flies.

Then dawn dreams under the morning star,
The mist drops into a golden bar;
And day with its kindling glories thrills
To the far-off chant on the happy hills,
Till a sudden glory breaks through the haze
And bursts in the shimmering noontide blaze.

Then Summer smiles over her shoulder,
And O to follow and fold her,
As into the south she flies!
And O to beseech and hold her
For the light of her loving eyes!

But the sun grows tender and cool and dim,
And sapphire shadows follow him.
Blue splendors out of the forest creep,
The chant on the hills soothes life to sleep,
And deep in the east, through a violet glow,
The wild gold fire of the moon burns low.

Then morn breaks darker and colder,
And storm and the wind, grown bolder,
Sweep from the hurrying skies,
For Summer looks over her shoulder
As into the south she flies.

A genuine enthusiasm for the study of American history has been developed through the influence of the Sons and Daughters of the Revolution and kindred societies. By fitting celebrations and the erection of monuments or tablets public attention has been called to the great and signal events of the Revolutionary period which have been overshadowed in the present generation by those of the Civil War. Besides, the early history of those remote times was written with a degree of reserve which led to the suppression of facts or opinions that may now be promulgated with safety. Many women's clubs this winter are serving a useful purpose by introducing topics of historical study along these lines.

Little things in common life, at home or in the round of daily work, a severer test of character than great afflictions—this was one of the lessons at a recent prayer meeting in a country church, when Job's Trials and Ours was the subject in course. A lady—apparently disregarding entirely Paul's advice to the women of old time; perhaps they did not have pre-arranged prayer meeting topics at Corinth, so that they could ask their husbands what to say about them—brought out finely the thought that our trials, if not Job's, consisted largely of petty vexations. Then a gentleman, a stranger in the meeting, arose and confirmed the thought by an incident of personal experience years before. The ship on which he was a passenger was caught in perilous fields of ice, which all night long crashed against her sides. But the word of Job gave the passenger perfect peace: "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." The morning came at last, the wind took the ice away and the ship to its desired haven. As they neared the port a huge Newfoundland dog in play jumped against the man and sprained his thumb, so that he had to undergo the humiliation of saluting his friends on shore with his left hand. He triumphed over the perils of icebergs in the sea, but a wounded thumb he could not bear! The writer of this can add from his experience another commentary on the patience of Job. It was made by a quaint old sea captain, who in his disappointment that an immense school of mackerel did not respond to the hook, exclaimed, "This would have tried the patience of Job." The reply was made to him that Job suffered far greater trials and bore them all patiently. "Perhaps he did," said the old fisherman, "but if old Job had had ten hundred thousand mackerel swimming right around his schooner, and ne'er a one give a bite, I know he would o' swore away like anything!" "Behold, we count them happy which endure"—the little temptations!

A MADONNA PARTY.

BY OLIVE E. DANA.

This is a unique and most fitting form of entertainment for the Advent month. A lady in a New England city gave such a one, only in this case it was a Madonna Tea, not many years ago. The idea is so unhackneyed, so easy of execution, and, withal, so abundant in Christmas suggestion, that it seems worthy of repeated development and adaptation. Just what suggested this happy variation from the accepted forms of hospitality does not appear. Perhaps it was the little groups that gather, even from the hurrying throngs of eager Christmas shoppers, before the sweet Madonna faces displayed in shop windows and art stores. Perhaps it was the recollection of treasures of her own, of this very sort, that made her aware of delightful possibilities in this direction. Or it might well have been a sense of the obvious incongruity of much of our Christmas merrymaking, the failure of the most of our festivities to express adequately any sweet or serious Advent thought, if, happily, they do sometimes hint broadly its intent.

But, whatever may have been its inspiration, the plans were laid, the preparations begun and the cards were sent for this "Madonna Tea." When the day arrived the guests were ushered into parlors from whose walls all other pictures had been removed to make room for Madonnas and groups of Madonnas of every variety of type and conception and execution. Friends had loaned their own collections, some of them rare copies of famous originals, some of them only unframed prints. Art stores had been searched and art catalogues hunted through for anything that would give interest or fullness or variety, and the result was a Christmas memory, and, perchance, a perception of the manifold interpretations and unexhausted import of the Advent meaning that will outlast many a hoar December.

One hopes that such a happiness was not for those for whom the most of these pictures were already familiar, and that the rapt or serious, the angelic or sweetly-thoughtful faces, so variously conceived, yet all telling so plainly one all-sufficing truth, did not look down alone on those who were concerned chiefly with art methods and schools. One wishes that such a pleasure could be given, every Yuletide, to all sorts and conditions of women. The invitation to enjoy such a collection would be a gracious and fitting form of hospitality for almost any woman's club or young people's society or church guild during the weeks when

The time draws near the birth of Christ.

The privilege of seeing the pictures need not, of course, be confined to two or three hours only. And yet, if the display were made the occasion of an evening gathering, many enjoyable features could be added. Old hymns of the nativity could be sung and appropriate readings given, while it would be especially interesting if some of the legends of the Madonnas, and particularly some of those connected with the pictures themselves, could be effectively rendered. There is no subject with which art has been so busy, none which it has so variously yet so devoutly and reverently conceived. It seems not too much to hope that its conceptions might have their office as helps toward the truer celebration and interpretation of Christmas, and hardly too much to ask that the gracious, if impalpable, bestowals of the Holy Child in his mother's arms might at least have place beside the benefactions of Kriss Kringle.

Among the poems especially suitable for recitation are Milton's Ode on the Nativity, Longfellow's Three Kings, R. W. Gilder's Christmas Hymn and A Madonna of Fra Lippo Lippi, Lucy Larcom's His Birthday and Woman's Christmas, Phœbe Cary's Christmas, "H. H.'s" Christmas Symphony and The Star, by Susan Coolidge. For the stories of the pictures and the legends linked with them reference should be made to Mrs. Jameson's Legends of the Madonnas and her Sacred and Legendary Art, or to Mrs. Clement's Handbook of Legendary and Mythological Art. While among the more familiar Christmas hymns are "Hark, the herald angels sing!" "Brightest and best of the sons of the morning!" "It came upon the midnight clear," "Calm on the listening ear of night," Martin Luther's "All praise to thee, Eternal Lord," and Phillips Brooks's "O little town of Bethlehem!"

GIFTS FOR GIRLS.

BY ELLEN CONWAY.

John and I used to have a world of trouble deciding what to give the children for Christmas. They always seemed to have about everything they wanted, or, at least, about everything we thought they ought to want. We are not rich people either—only "in comfortable circumstances." But at Christmas time one realizes how many comforts "comfortable circumstances" involve. We grew grave as we counted them over. More than our share, they seemed. Our washerwoman's children would be so grateful for mittens, and yet we could hardly venture to give our own kid gloves. But so it was. The "necessaries" of life—food, clothing, shelter, a chance to go to school—these our children had as a matter of course. And as for the superfluities—jewelry, bric-a-brac, perfumery and what-not—John and I have always had an old-fashioned prejudice against spending much on them. What were we going to do?

The year business was so poor it was all quite simple. Mamma had to keep her girls pretty shabby through the fall, and by Christmas time they were glad enough to get, one a new coat and the others hats. But business looked up again and the allowances went back to the old figure, and the next year the problem was as perplexing as ever. But it was the next year that we solved it. At least we discovered a guiding principle. It is the principle of permanent utility.

There was Antoinette's trunk, for instance. Probably it would never have occurred to Antoinette that she needed a trunk. She always borrowed one of mine when she went away. But now that she has her own she really enjoys packing away her summer clothes in winter, and her winter clothes in summer, and feeling that she knows herself exactly where they are. Candidly, if you ask me, I do not think she was so much pleased with the trunk at first as she would have been with something more frivolous. But it was a very pretty one and had her initials on the end, which gratified her, and I am sure she would tell you now that it was one of the very best presents she ever had. There's no harm in giving children things now and then that they have to "grow to." It develops them. We have provided Antoinette since with a traveling bag, too. A small school bag she had before, of course. Sometime I want her to own a traveling shawl. They last for years and do not go badly out of style. She needs a bath-robe, too, and a summer dressing-sacque, and if she doesn't contrive them pretty soon out of her allowance I think I shall threaten her with them for her birthday.

Miriam we are fitting out with furnishings for her room. One year we gave her a pretty wash set, an apple blossom pattern, and another a wood-basket. Kitty has embroidered a set of scarfs for her bureau and washstand, and Antoinette has erected a great and glorious shoe bag on her closet door. Last birthday I gave her a set of hemstitched sheets and pillowcases—the only ones we have in the house, by the way. She does not keep them in steady use, but puts them on when she wants to be especially fine for company. Next I think I shall choose a fancy spread, or a sateen puff for the foot of the bed. I should like each of the girls to have a really handsome pair of blankets and a dozen fine towels with embroidered initials. In the line of the old-fashioned dowry these last are, but I don't like them any the less for that. Few women go through life without sometime feeling the impulse to gather household possessions about them and have "a home of their own," even if it must be solitary and in a boarding house. I always particularly enjoy giving my girls a bit of silver—an orange spoon, or a paper knife or a bonbon dish—and I always have the initials and date put on. Those add so much to the interest in after years.

Kitty had her banjo lessons for her Christmas present one year, and her china painting another. Her papa thought perhaps we ought to call those part of her "education," and it certainly was a debatable question. But I persuaded John to give himself—and his pocketbook—the benefit of the doubt, for once.

Pictures we often give the girls, and books. We always try to choose something really good, something that they will enjoy ten years from now as much as now. They really have the beginning of an excellent little library between them. I aspire to a bookcase for them some day, and perhaps a desk and a rattan couch—they could accumulate the cushions themselves. And a new rug for the room where they do their studying, and perhaps new draperies. And chairs—I never go to town without being tempted by some new delight in the line of chairs. These would all be too expensive for single presents, but perhaps not for combinations. One can spend with a better conscience anyway when one is buying something that will last.

"DOWN TO SLEEP."

November woods are bare and still;
November days are clear and bright;
Each noon burns up the morning's chill;
The morning's snow is gone by night;
Each day my steps grow slow, grow light,
As through the woods I reverent creep
Watching all things lie "down to sleep."

I never knew before what beds,
Fragrant to smell and soft to touch,
The forest sifts and shapes and spreads:
I never knew before how much
Of human sound there is in such
Low tones as through the forest sweep
When all wild things lie "down to sleep."

Each day I find new coverlids
Tucked in, and more sweet eyes shut tight;
Sometimes the viewless mother bids
Her ferns kneel down, full in my sight;
I hear their chorus of "good night."
And half I smile and half I weep
Listening while they lie "down to sleep."

November woods are bare and still;
November days are bright and good;
Life's noon burns up life's morning chill;
Life's night rests feet which long have stood;
Some warm, soft bed, in field or wood,
The mother will not fail to keep
Where we can lay us "down to sleep."

SHALL OUR CHILDREN WEAR BLACK?

BY FLORENCE HULL WINTERBURN.

A writer of some repute has made a suggestion to mothers, through the columns of a widely read journal, that little children be dressed in black dresses and undergarments of the same sable hue, to save washing and in order that they may play in the dirt ad libitum without offending the eyes of observers by too conspicuous uncleanliness. There are several strong objections to this idea, both from sanitary reasons and from the standpoint of the children's welfare and happiness.

In the first place, dirt is dirt, whether it is in or out of sight. If a baby's face is soiled we wash it, not only for appearances sake, but because a dirty skin is an unhealthy skin. If the pores are clogged extra work is thrown upon lungs, liver and kidneys, and the whole body suffers. If dirt is left to dry on, the tender skin in time adjusts itself to conditions and becomes hard and leathery. The knees of a child who is only bathed once a week are almost certain to be encrusted with matter that will not wash off, but remains and is added to continually.

No careful mother would think of permitting this, and yet it is just as detrimental to put upon the clean skin of the child after his morning bath grimy undergarments that only do not show the results of several days' wear because they are the color of sin themselves. "A black chemiloon!" Recollect that this garment we induct our baby into is to be to him all day another cuticle, something rubbing against him and hanging to him that he cannot shake off if it is ever so uncomfortable and unpleasant. And to some naturally dainty children the sight of a dirty garment is odious; the feeling of it will surely make them miserable even if they cannot trace the cause of their discomfort. And the deceitful black thing will probably appear so much better than it is that even after a week's wear an imprudent mother or indolent nurse might think it capable of further duty.

For the sake of our children's complexions, if for no other reason, let us give them at least a semi-weekly change of undergarments. Wool underwear may be red or gray in winter, but in warm weather, when children play outdoors more and get their clothing more soiled, underwear should be white, because we want to know all the dirt that exists and not keep foulness hidden. Outer garments need not be white; pretty, bright colors are preferable. But pray don't robe the little ones in black. The effect upon their spirits and temper will be baneful. Every normal child detests black as he dreads grey clouds and all other gloomy things. It is noticeable that in households where the mother wears mourning children are depressed and dispirited, and I have observed a marked melancholy upon the faces of mere babies who wear sable ribbons in concession to the general grief of a household.

The association of black with the more awful side of death is too common for even the youngest child to escape, but even if this idea was not suggested there is something the reverse of cheerful in this color which is the grave of all colors, and children feel it. Watch from the window some morning as the stream of schoolchildren pass, and note the friskiness of the little red bird in her scarlet merino and the bright faces of the wee men and maids who sport the tints of spring in their jackets and hats; then see the comparative soberness of the child who is clad in black, or even in brown or grey, without the enlivening touch of brilliant color appropriate to his years and sensitive mind. Color is a child's idea of beauty, appreciation of form coming later in life; and just as our mature taste craves in dress and surroundings graceful outlines, the instinct of youth passionately demands those bright and vivid hues that reflect the sunlight and are symbols of cheerfulness and hope.

AFIELD WITH YOUNG NATURALISTS.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS.

BY MRS S. J. BUCKLIN.

We talked last month of nuts, which are really seeds, and now we will talk of some of the ways in which seeds are scattered over the earth. Thistle, dandelion and some other seeds have a tuft of silky hairs by which they are raised, like tiny balloons, into the air and are wafted even across seas. Maple and ash seeds fly on wings, balsam and witch hazel toss out their seeds by the bursting of the receptacles, earth stars (a species of mushroom) roll up in dry weather and are trundled about by the wind, burdocks and other barbed or hooked seeds are conveyed on clothing or in the wool and fur of animals. "Seeds," says Linnæus, "embark upon the rivers which descend from the highest mountains of Lapland and arrive at the middle of the plains and the coasts of the seas. The ocean has thrown even upon the coasts of Norway the nuts of the mahogany and the fruit of the cocoanut tree, borne on its waves from the far distant tropical regions; and this wonderful voyage has been performed without injury to the vital energy of the seeds." An instance came to my knowledge of cocoanuts from a wrecked vessel that floated ashore on an island near Florida. They were planted and the island is now covered with cocoanut groves.

The seed of the willow, poplar, balm-of-gilead and cotton-plant have a downy covering, which in the latter plant provides clothing for man. Birds and animals, ocean currents, rivers and streams, all do their part in carrying seeds from one locality to another. Weeds travel in sacks of grain. A cow plants an apple tree by the wayside. A bird drops a currant in a swamp or even in the crotch of a tree, where I have seen a currant bush growing. Busy squirrels plant acorns, chestnuts and walnuts and speedily a forest springs up. Every seed holds within itself a germ of life, and under proper treatment, even if hidden in a tomb for thousands of years, seeds have been known to germinate. The wise Creator provided protection for the young plant in its tiny casket, and under the genial influence of heat and moisture it springs up into new life.

Plants that are useless weeds in one country are garden ornaments in another. One May evening a friend brought me a beautiful flower which she found growing near a new wall by the roadside. It was entirely unfamiliar to me and excited my admiration and curiosity. It looked like a fugitive from some garden. I could not analyze it without seeing the leaves, and, while questioning whether a seed had blown from some garden or had been upturned in digging a trench for the wall, we were told that a gardener dumped refuse near that wall. Our informer had found the same plant and had transplanted some roots which had lived but did not increase. When my friend picked the flower a boy said: "That is 'bluebells.' It grows out West as common as dandelions grow here. In some places the ground is blue with it."

"Bluebells" is an ambiguous name given to a number of plants widely different in habit and appearance. If a flower is blue and bell-shaped it is straightway called a bluebell. The flower resembled in shape and color a species of wild phlox I had seen in western New York and among greenhouse plants in Massachusetts. The long slender stem supported a drooping bunch of trumpet-shaped flowers varying from pinkish-blue to lilac in the color of the buds and turquoise blue in the blossoms.

The plant belonged to the borrageworts. Wood's botany called it smooth lungwort. Gray named it Virginian cowslip, lungwort, bluebells. Here was the local name given by the boy. "Bluebells" it surely was, but how had it traveled from West to East and found a dwelling place by the new wall? A local botanist solved the mystery. The plant had grown in one garden in town for thirty years and in another for a longer period. No one could tell how or when it left its native place and became civilized. It had emigrated in a dump cart with other plants to keep it company and established itself by the wayside. My informer had seen it growing in Kentucky, but not as large as under cultivation. Another variety of this plant grows in thick patches over rocks and sand at Mt. Desert. This kind, contrary to the first, makes abundant seed and runs through the scale of color in an astonishing way.

This little incident shows how easily a wild flower may become a garden plant and again return to wayside wildness.

Mothers in Council.

HOW CAN PARENTS KEEP ACQUAINTED WITH THE DAILY LIFE OF THEIR CHILDREN IN THEIR TEENS?

[An address made Nov. 4 at the rally of the Mothers' and Teachers' Association, Brookline, Mass., by Mrs. H. B. Eager.]

After the able, ingenious and helpful presentation of the subject, one cannot hope to add anything except the stress of another voice. First, Why are you asking this question? Is it an acknowledgment that you have not the confidence of your children, and fear that that confidence will weaken them? My dear women, what is the matter with you, if this is true? Something must be radically wrong if this is the case. Call to mind the eyes of your little ones, blue, black, hazel, gray, brown, what you will, those angel eyes, that are not even veils, only transparent liquids between you and souls, and charge them with the fault if you dare. I know I must keep myself well in hand just here, but I have seen such fearful blunderings with these holy things, pure, human souls, fresh from God's hand, that it is not easy to remain calm. O! mothers, you are treading holy ground and how dare you fail—fail here at the highest mark that God has set you! If your failure simply meant your failure, you might go with it, but your failure means the deterioration of souls. To train souls is the highest thing that God has asked any one to do—and to fail here! How will you hold up your heads when you hand back these souls trusted to your training? Are you going to say—"I tried to get good nurses for my babies?" Those babies were given to you. God added them to your blessings. How is it that you did not so reconstruct your lives that you kept them close to you? They had the first right to you. Why instead of your soft hands and gentle coercion did they have to submit to the handling and society of hirelings? Why did you miss your chance with the little plastic things? What were you doing all this time? Were you, honestly now, not out, some of the time, perhaps a good bit of the time, handing that talisman, that bit of white paper with your name upon it, in at some acquaintance's door? Were you not paying court to some one? O! if you had been paying court to the little ones about your feet!

You say our American life is so full, so intense we cannot do everything. Full, intense, about what? Intense about the conventionalities of life. Intense about fine wardrobes. Intense about delicate food, daintily served. But are you intense that your children are close to you in thought and affection? I fear that most of us have got hold of the wrong end of life when such a wail as the statement of this question comes from the mothers.

How are you going to do this thing? If you do it at all in their teens you will have done it from their babyhood right on up. How can you fill your time so full of the hollow motions of life when you have such treasures within your doors. I am trying, if I can, to make you feel with me the wealth of those treasures. Souls that will move this world if you are not stones in their way. Souls that will blossom into magnificence if you tread rightly.

How are you going to do it? I cannot tell you. No one can tell you. You know your children and yourselves as no one else can. But if you once get it into your souls that you must and will, you will do it. Ways and means will solve themselves. You do everything else. You feed them well, you clothe them well, you dress them well, you educate them well. Now, why cannot you do this? You can. Plenty have done it before you. But they did not fill their time so full that there was no strength nor energy left for this, their greatest work.

Make everything revolve about this. Bent on this one thing, you will see how quickly it will be begun. Down on your knees and pray for strength and guidance, but jump up and find for yourself the knowledge to do that for which you have been praying. Get hold of things by the right end, get things rightly balanced, and then spring into them with all the fervor of assured success. Strive with yourselves. Almost the last words of Lord Shaftesbury were, "Depend upon it, we shall beat the devil yet, if we only keep on to the end and never despair."

Browning, who understood so well that the battle of life was within one's self, wrote:

When the fight begins within himself,
A man's worth something. God stoops o'er his head,
Satan looks up between his feet—both tug—
He's left, himself, i' the middle; the soul wakes
And grows. Prolong that battle through his life.
Never leave growing till the life to come.

Let a man contend to the uttermost
For his life's set prize.

This world's no blot for us,
Nor blank; it means intensely, and means good.
To find its meaning is my meat and drink.

TOPICS FOR MOTHERS' MEETINGS.

Those who have the responsibility of planning for these gatherings are always on the lookout for desirable subjects to discuss. We therefore append half a dozen selected from the Maternal Association in the South Church, New Britain, Ct.:

The Value of a Tranquil Life.
The Indebtedness of Parents to Children, or Children in the Home as Educators.
Truthful Living.
Cultivation of the Speaking Voice in the Home.
Christian Character, Its Inward Growth and Outward Expression.
Rights of Men and Children.

EFFECT OF "THE BLUES" ON CHILDREN.

Dear Mothers: Let your little ones be sure that "there is sunshine in your souls." Let them never doubt the brightness of your own faith and theirs will not be clouded. This little incident from personal experience will point the message which I bring you.

I was trying to speak cheering words to a man in middle life, who was indulging in a fit of depression. He said, "If I had your sunny disposition, I should be thankful." But I told him, "It is not my disposition, it is Christ in me that makes me hopeful; you need him." Then he gave me this sad answer, "My mother has been a professor of religion for many years, and she often has the blues." What answer could I give to one whom his mother disappointed? Yet that poor mother was so far from realizing what she lacked that she hoped her son would be a Christian some day and thought she was trying to persuade him to be one. While he, watching her with a hungry heart for years, was disappointed in her religion. He left this life not long ago with no hope, so far as his dearest friends know, in his mother's Saviour.

O, mothers, in partnership with the "God of hope," may he who has intrusted these immortal souls to your care make you to abound in hope, that you may never dwarf or destroy the perfect trust in him which is natural to his little ones. E. C. B.

The most beautiful witness to the evolution of man is the mind of a little child. The stealing in of that inexplicable light called consciousness, the first flicker of memory, the gradual governance of will, the silent ascendancy of reason—these are studies in evolution the oldest, the sweetest and the most full of meaning for mankind. Every mother is an unconscious evolutionist, and every little child a living witness to the ascent.—Henry Drummond.

God help us mothers all to live aright,
And may our homes all love and truth enfold,
Since life for us no loftier aims can hold
Than leading little children in the light.

Closet and Altar

Begin each day by tarrying before God and letting him touch you. Take time to meet God.

Resignation is putting God between one's self and one's grief.—Madame Swetchine.

No one may cherish a hope of loving God perfectly in the future life who does not begin to love him in this life. The kingdom of God must begin in the heart of man in this life or it will never be consummated in the life that is to come.—Gerhard.

Each man has his own special form in which self denial is required of him. We need pure eyes and hearts kept in very close communion with Jesus to ascertain what our particular cross is. He has them of many patterns, sizes, shapes and materials. We can always make sure of strength to carry the one he means us to carry, but not of strength to bear what is not ours.—F. B. Meyer.

O Lord, my God, 'tis early dawn,
And I would walk with thee today!
Clothe me in garments white and clean,
All bright and beautiful, I pray.
Grant I may walk with greatest care,
So I may keep their luster bright;
Today, my Father, hear my prayer,
And let me walk with thee in white.

For the blessings of freedom and self-government we ought to thank God. . . There is not an (American) among us all who ought not to feel and to rejoice that he is a son of

> The land which freemen till,
> Which sober-suited freedom chose;
> A land where, girt with friends or foes,
> A man may speak the thing he will.

We, then—perhaps more than any nation under the sun—owe this debt of thanksgiving unto God. . . . So shall we be able to hold our own against every force which can be brought against us; so shall we realize more and more the Psalmist's golden picture of national prosperity, that "truth shall flourish out of the earth, and righteousness look down from heaven. Yea, the Lord shall show loving kindness, and our land shall give her increase. Righteousness shall go before him and he shall direct her going in the way."—F. W. Farrar.

"Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, the Lord of glory and of righteousness, who rulest all things from eternity to eternity, Lord of Lords, God of Gods, King of Kings! The throne of thy fame is forever and ever, and forever and ever shall thy name be honored. Blessed and glorious art thou! Thou hast fashioned all things, thou hast power over all, and all things lie naked and open unto thee. Thou seest all things, and nothing can be hidden from thy sight." So rule our hearts that we may serve thee as thy children ought. So open our eyes that we may behold thy fullness in the person of thy Son, our Lord. Teach us to worship thee with humility in confession of our sin; with gratitude for the mercies, unexampled and undeserved, which have come to us from thine open hand; with consecration of our time, our means, our hearts to thy service. And reveal thyself to our expectant hearts more fully by the indwelling of thy Holy Spirit, through the merits of our Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE SMALL FOX OF CASTE.

In The Congregationalist for Oct. 29 the question was asked if the small fox of caste was nibbling at the vine of Christian unity in Congregational churches. The writer cannot answer the question, but has observed in all places a certain number of people who flatter themselves that they appear superior to their fellowman by refusing to recognize those outside a charmed circle. Our genial old philosopher, Oliver Wendell Holmes, true aristocrat that he was, held some very decided opinions of this class of people. In his Autocrat at the Breakfast Table he thus describes them: "She who nips off the end of a brittle courtesy, as one breaks the end of an icicle, to bestow upon those whom she ought cordially and kindly to recognize, proclaims the fact that she comes not merely of low blood, but of bad blood. Consciousness of unquestioned position makes people gracious in proper measure to all, but if a woman puts on airs with her real equals she has something about herself or her family she is ashamed of, or ought to be. Middle, and more than middle, aged people, who know family histories, generally see through it. An official of standing was rude to me once. 'O, that is the maternal grandfather,' said a wise old friend to me, 'he was a boor.'"

All have the right to restrict their circle of intimate friends to as small a number as they choose. But kind words spoken to poor members of their church entail no social obligation, and they do brighten a little the hard lot of those less fortunate than themselves. The "Autocrat" would never have advised a woman to be cordial and kind simply to conceal from the eye of experience the weak place in her family escutcheon. But he set us all an example in his daily life, that, should we follow it, would bring sunshine to many a lonely mortal. Secure in his own unquestioned position and thoroughly kind at heart, he gave a smile and a pleasant word to every one who had the slightest claim to acquaintance with him. Far too many of us fear the frown of a certain "set" more than actual wrongdoing. A. M. D. S.

Another comment on the same question comes from a male contributor, who says:

Some features and expressions of so called snobbishness are really the manifestation of self-respect, a proper regard for one's position and character. In our universal democracy anything that is decent is apt to be termed snobbish by certain persons. It is hardly safe to wear clean clothes or a linen collar among them, and really if a sincere man desires to do the most good it must be an open question whether he speaks to or utterly ignores some of his own neighbors.

Church membership does not cover every sin, though it covers every grade of character. Even in church sociables one must yet discriminate in his associates. One must judge for himself how he should conduct himself towards others, and whom he should recognize. It is unfortunate to be thin skinned in the present age. If that sentimental idea of human equality ever possessed this people, it is most thoroughly eliminated now. The real fact of the day is the caste spirit. Snobbishness? Why we are all becoming like the man who discovered his neighbor drowning and refrained giving any assistance because he had never been introduced! Verily there is abundant room for Professor Herron's new church. For if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others. Do not even the publicans the same? G. F. W.

UNFOLDING.

When bursts the rose of the spirit
From its withering calyx sheath,
And the bud has become a blossom
Of heavenly color and breath,
Life utters its true revelation
Through the silence that we call death.
—Lucy Larcom.

I have a firm impression, founded upon such facts as I am master of and upon all my experience of legislation, that, if the law ever comes to draw a distinction on behalf of the innocent party in divorce, it cannot be permanently or stably held. There are, I have no doubt, parties entirely innocent, and their cases will be blazoned before us until the church, now so solidly based, shall be got upon the ice. At that stage a resistless battery will be opened upon her.—William E. Gladstone.

The Conversation Corner.

TWO weeks ago we had in the Corner a picture of the Frigate Constitution and Harry T.'s letter about it. There is another historical subject which has called out several letters from our children—Gen. Israel Putnam. From these I have selected one written in his native town.

ABINGTON, CT.

Mr. Martin; Dear Sir: . . . My memory is very good for one in her eighty-fifth year. It used to be a common expression when I was young, if they couldn't decide on a case, "Ask Put; she will tell." That is the name I went by. I shall tell you the wolf story as I heard it from my beloved grandmother, who was General Israel Putnam's daughter. Consequently I am his great-granddaughter. Grandfather Putnam moved from Salem, Mass., to Pomfret. He used about 600 acres, set out fruit trees and introduced the Roxbury russet into Pomfret. A pear tree has stood till within a few years past, and the well that he dug is still in use.

There was a wolf that annoyed the farmers very much. They would shoot her cubs, but couldn't find where she kept herself. They set traps, and succeeded at last in trapping one of her fore feet, but she extricated herself by leaving her toes in the trap. One morning grandfather went out and found seventy-two sheep and lambs dead in the yard that she had killed in the night. Then they formed a company to hunt her till they killed her. They could track her easily on the snow, as she had lost her toes. They followed her almost to Hartford (forty miles), then she took a circuitous route and came to her den, the roughest place imaginable. The first thing they did was to burn brimstone to smoke her out, but that did not start her. Grandfather wanted a slave of his to go into the den. He declined, so he went in himself. They tied a rope around his body; he was to kick the rope as a sign to be drawn out. When he got in sight of her she gave a terrible howl. He kicked the rope, and they drew him out so fast that his clothes were torn from his body and flesh lacerated. But he soon rallied and went in again. When he got in sight of her eye he fired, and was pulled out again. The third time he drew out the wolf, gun and torch. The wolf lay several days in a house not far from here for people to see. The old house was torn down a few years ago.

The wolf story is strictly true. The den is still to be seen, and hundreds of people visit it in the summer. It is in Abington, one of the five villages of Pomfret. The grounds around the den are heavily wooded. It is one mass of rocks. The subject was brought before our last legislature to buy it and inclose it. I think it will pass the coming legislature. Yours very respectfully and kindly,

MARY P. SHARPE.

I hope it will, and if any of our readers are members of the Connecticut legislature, they must help it on. We are all obliged to Mrs. S. for sending us this family tradition of the wolf incident. And now about the other picture. It is one of several kindly sent to the Corner by Mrs. K. of Norfolk, Ct., all taken in "Putnam Memorial Park" in the town of Redding, Ct. On the site of this beautiful park, then a wild, rough, out of the way place, Putnam's little army had its camp in the winter of 1778–79. A fine monument has been erected, with block houses and log cabins in imitation of the ancient camp, but Dr. K. writes:

The monument of the place and the time, the one those yeomen themselves left, is a long, double line of dilapidated fireplaces belonging to their log cabins. Bunker Hill Monument means more, but it cannot stir the blood as these heaps of stones do.

The picture shows the monument in the distance and the sites of the rude huts, where, as at Valley Forge, brave men suffered cold and hunger and hardship that we might have a free country. They spent "the last Thursday of November" there, but how differently from our enjoyment of this Thanksgiving Day!

(Mary P. of Sterling, Mass., says in her letter that "he left his work, mounted his horse and rode to Cambridge"—which certainly was more sensible than to rush off on foot! Florence R. of Hudson, Mich., adds the account of his famous break-neck ride down the Horseneck steps. Frank B. of Nashua, N. H., gives the inscription on his tombstone [in Brooklyn, Ct.]: "He dared to lead where others dared to follow.")

Do you remember that Harold S. of Danvers invited the Corner last spring to visit that historic town? I had not, and rode out there last week, my cyclometer registering thirteen miles and six-tenths. Our principal visit was to the ancient "Putnam house," seen in the first picture (for which we are indebted to Mr. Halliday of the "Old Corner Bookstore"), and mentioned by Nettie P. Miss Putnam, a relative of the General, resides there, and her sister, Mrs. Philbrick, took great pains to show us over the house and tell us about it. To me the most interesting sight of all was a corner in one of the numerous and quaint old attics, devoted to the children of different generations who visit the homestead, and having its "cubby-houses," little chairs and other things to delight little hearts. I saw also a photograph of an Ohio baby, born in 1894, the fifth Israel Putnam in direct descent from the patriot. Children are not now allowed to go up in the aged and decaying willow, but of course I had to climb up as your representative.

Of the delightful call at Oak Knoll, the home of Whittier, of the witchcraft monument (for Danvers Center is the ancient "Salem Village"), of seeing "Sam. Parris" (not the witchcraft minister, but a huge, yellow cat!) and other things I cannot speak. Harold rode out with me on the old turnpike which for ninety years has led from Newburyport to Boston, and we called on Nettie P., finding her and other girls at a pasture picnic; great rocks were their houses, on the banks of the Mississippi, with the Appalachian Range on one side, and the Rockies on the other—the last were not as high as the first, but they had to name them according to the points of the compass!

Mr. Martin

GEN. ISRAEL PUTNAM.

General Putnam was born in Danvers, Mass., Jan. 7, 1718. His ancestors came from Buckinghampshire, Eng., and settled in Danvers in 1634. The house where he was born is pleasantly situated on Maple Street, near the Newburyport turnpike, and near the foot of Danvers Asylum Hill. It was built in 1648. I live about a mile from this ancient house, and while visiting there lately the ladies kindly took me to the room where General Putnam was born. It is a low room, with a large, open fireplace. There is a wooden sword hanging in the room which a nephew made for him. There is also a straight-backed chair, the only one left in which General Putnam sat. There is a large willow tree at the back of the house. I got a piece of the bark.

We do not find much about his boyhood and youth recorded, but from what we do find he displayed as much daring as in after years. In his earlier years he had much strength, and was desirous of accomplishing the labors of a man while yet a boy. At twenty-one years of age he removed to Pomfret, Ct. There is a story which we read in history about General Putnam and his neighbors being very much troubled with a wolf which killed their sheep. They found the wolf's den and he took a musket and torch and crawled into the den. The wolf welcomed him with a growl and as she was about to spring he fired, then almost suffocated by the smoke he came out. After a time he entered again and taking the wolf by the ears drew her out.

He distinguished himself in the French war. He was appointed major in the year 1757, lieutenant colonel in 1759, and in 1775 he held the rank of major general. It is said that when the news of the battle of Lexington reached him he was plowing in his field and seizing his coat from a tree where it hung turned his horses loose and rushed to battle. He was at Bunker Hill and did good service there. In the year 1779 he had an attack of paralysis which disabled him from further service. Thus died in 1790 a man who had distinguished himself from a youth for courage and heroism. Mrs. Philbrick gave me a picture of General Putnam. He looks very smart and brave. I am eleven years old.

Danvers Center, Mass. NETTIE P.

About that wolf story "which we read in history," I have wondered whether it would not some time share the fate of George Washington's cherry tree and William Tell's apple. Seeing a few weeks ago in a newspaper that an aged lady, a direct descendant of General Putnam, was still living in Connecticut, I wrote to her, asking if she knew by tradition that the story was true. In reply she wrote me this letter, which is worth preserving, as affording proof of the narrative, if by and by it should be claimed that there never was a den or a wolf in Putnam's history:

LESSON FOR DEC. 6. 1 Kings 11: 4–13.

SOLOMON'S SIN.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

We have followed the career of Solomon in his glory. We are now to consider his downfall. Nothing in the Old Testament is more suggestive than this of practical and impressive lessons, both personal and national. Solomon is the most conspicuous success and the most remarkable failure in Jewish history. He received a splendid inheritance. He was endowed with rare gifts and sought to use wisely all that he possessed. He succeeded. His wisdom became the admiration of the world. But when he had reached the hights of fame his ambition overleaped itself, till, like blind Samson, he grasped the pillars on which the nation rested and buried himself beneath its ruins.

Our perils are as real as his and the nation's which he governed. Old men are still tottering to falls like his. Young men are preparing for similar disasters to overtake their age. God has made every man in the nation a sovereign, and has given to him great trusts and opportunities. The fate of our republic depends on the way these opportunities are to be met and these trusts fulfilled. We may find warning and guidance by studying the causes of Solomon's fall. This passage makes prominent these causes:

1. Too many wives. Polygamy was not then a sin. Solomon had at least two wives when God at Gibeon gave him assurance of his favor. One of these was an Egyptian princess [ch. 3: 1] and one was an Ammonitess, who was already the mother of Rehoboam. Compare ch. 11: 42 with 14: 21. But if addition of wives was permitted their multiplication was forbidden [Deut. 17: 17]. And Solomon's family arithmetic dealt with large figures. "He had 700 wives, princesses, and 300 concubines." In this direction he took his first steps toward ruin. Such a multitude of women destroyed all semblance of home in the royal palace. Pride, pushed by his wives' demands, made him lavishly extravagant. Sensuality killed his sensitiveness to spiritual things and also weakened his intellect.

But even one wife or one husband may be too many. By marriage two lives become one. If they are not really united in the highest aims there will usually be discord, unless both come together on the lower level [2 Cor. 6: 14]. Many young men and women living near to God have opened the way for misery in their old age by marrying "strange" wives or husbands.

2. Too many gods. Solomon knew the true God. He deliberately disobeyed him [vs. 9, 10] though no doubt expecting to keep his heart from turning away. He built the splendid temple from plans revealed by the Holy Spirit to his father. He saw the glory of the Lord fill it as he prayed. Yet, over against its marble whiteness on the southern hights of Olivet he built, to please his wives, temples to idols. The mount on which he erected them became known by the name which had been used only three times before in sacred history—once applied to the mysterious being who smote with death all the first born of Israel on the Passover night, once to the spoilers who went out of the Philistine camp to destroy Israel, and once to the avenging angel who made havoc among the people after David had numbered them. The builder of the first temple became the destroyer of his nation. With the weakness of approaching age, through his wives turning away his heart after other gods, there stole over him the spiritual weakness which hastened toward decay, till, like Samson going out from the presence of Delilah, Solomon "wist not that the Lord was departed from him."

It seems incredible that this should have been the end of so wise a man, of one who had so intimately known God. Yet his folly is being continually repeated. The only way to keep aloof from strange gods is to be held by a living, growing passion for the true God. Passion is too strong for principle. Passion always overcomes. Nothing less than a passionate love for God as seen in Jesus Christ can keep one from being overcome by evil passions. No one is safe because of his inheritance, or because of past evidence of God's favor, or because of past spiritual experiences. "What I want," said Raphael in Kingsley's Hypatia, "is not to possess a religion, but to have a religion that shall possess me." It is folly to choose husband or wife or associations of any sort without taking into account their ultimate effect on our loyalty to God. Here wise men often fail.

3. Too great prosperity. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," both individuals and nations. Prosperity comes from God, but it has its limitations and its dangers. It allures to selfishness, extravagance, effeminacy, irreligion and oppression. As Solomon's army, navy, harem, horses, chariots and heathen shrines increased, taxes to support them became enormous. Judah was enriched at the expense of the other tribes. People came to love luxury and covet money. The poor longed for the property of the rich and the rich longed for what the poor possessed. The poor paid for the prosperity of the rich, and they kept thinking about it. "Thy father made our yoke grievous," said they to Rehoboam. In these directions lie our nation's chief perils. A great responsibility rests on the possessors of wealth. Many of them, East and West, have become rich suddenly, and not all of them honestly. Selfish use of wealth is all ways regarded as a menace. Political revolution follows sure on social corruption.

Solomon got all he wanted. But when he had it he counted it "vanity." His misery was that he had destroyed his capacity to want. His end is the supreme Old Testament illustration of this most solemn question, "What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world and forfeit his life?"

4. Too few prophets. The writer of Ecclesiastes puts into Solomon's mouth the counsel, "Neither make thyself overwise; why shouldest thou destroy thyself?" Perhaps Solomon's wisdom thus became a curse to him, for he seems to have felt no need of teachers. Nathan, who had trained him, and who saved to him the throne, lived during a great part, at least, of his public life, for he wrote his biography [2 Chron. 9: 29]. But he is not once mentioned as having any influence over his former pupil. Only one prophet appears in Solomon's life, and that one, Ahijah, had a message not for the king but to encourage a usurper of his throne. When rulers and nations become indifferent to the voice of God, they invite their doom. The magnificent temple brought ritualism and ritualism was supplanted by idolatry, and God was forgotten. But he did not forget. He was not thwarted by Solomon turning a deaf ear to his warning. What Solomon would not hear, Jeroboam would; and what could not be spoken openly was uttered when two were alone in the field [ch. 11: 29 ff.]. Men may be indifferent to the preaching of the truth, may even silence the prophets, but they cannot alter the truth or avert the consequences of ignoring it.

There is only space to allude to the brighter side of this sad picture of Solomon's sin and fall. He broke his covenant, forfeited wisdom, betrayed his trust, brought ruin on himself and his nation. Yet God was merciful to him for his father's sake. David's faithfulness stretched its protection over degenerate Solomon. It left him to die a king. It gave one tribe to his son. How much God counts the power of a faithful life! How much more merciful is his anger than man's! Not all the evil wrought by wicked men will prevent the reign of righteousness which God has determined to bring in, when Jesus Christ will be enthroned in every heart and the peace of heaven will fill the earth.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

OUR OWN WORK.

Christian Literature in Bulgaria. The eagerness of the people for reading and the avidity with which Christian literature is received are marked features of our missionary work in Bulgaria. The mission has done valuable service in its publication department during the less than forty years of its existence, having given the Bulgarians the Bible in the vernacular, Bible dictionary, Christian hymns, the family newspaper and the beginning of an evangelical library, with a multitude of tracts. In a brightly-written illustrated article in Life and Light Miss E. M. Stone of Philippopolis points to the Bulgarian women who are coming to the front in the effort to provide a more worthy literature than the translations of French and Russian novels and German materialistic writings which the publishers place on their counters for eager readers. A Christian graduate of our mission girls' school in Samokov holds the honorable position of Stationer and Publisher to the Court of Prince Ferdinand. "Some American women," says Miss Stone, "will be glad through all eternity that they helped to educate this noble and influential woman, when she was a simple village girl from a very humble home." Another graduate of the same institution, who is now teaching in a government high school, edited and published last year a family magazine in Bulgarian, and others from the Samokov school are doing valuable work as writers and translators, and are active leaders in temperance, literary and musical circles. In view of the awakening of intellectual life and the constant demand for good literature, it is most unfortunate that from lack of funds no new books are issuing from the mission press this year. There is danger even that the mission paper, which has never succumbed to Turkish intolerance during its life of a score of years in Constantinople, may be suspended in December, but we trust that American Christians will not permit it to die for lack of the small sum necessary to maintain it.

New Outpost in Gazaland. News comes through Mr. Wilder of our East Central African mission of a favorable opening for Christian teaching in a community 126 miles to the east of Mt. Silinda. The way has been prepared by means of the independent work of two or three lads who had formerly been under the influence of our missionaries. These young men have held religious services and some twenty persons have become professed Christians. This step has not met with the approval of their neighbors, it seems, and the new converts have been obliged to submit to persecution. The young evangelists, too, have been repeatedly threatened with death, but they have persisted in preaching among the surrounding villages. Mr. Wilder writes that the mission has decided to undertake the responsibility of sending two Zulu helpers to live for a time among these people, adding: "We believe God will approve by granting the means. To neglect entirely such an opening as a new mission field, the first opening of the kind, would be utter folly."

THE WORLD AROUND.

The Indian Famine. Dr. Grace Kimball recently prefaced an account of her relief work in Van, Turkey, by the statement that sometimes missionaries are called upon not to preach nor to teach, but to exemplify the words of the Master, "I was an hungered and ye gave me meat." In view of the threatened famine in India, it looks as if missionaries in that country might be called upon for similar humanitarian service. According to the St. James Gazette, agricultural prospects in Northern India could hardly be more hopeless. The early break of the rains has had a disastrous effect in the Punjab and Northwest Provinces, while the outlook for the spring crops in the central provinces is most unfavorable. It is feared that acute distress is inevitable throughout a large portion of Northern and Central India as far south as Nagpoor and as far east as Patna. Even should next spring bring an abundant harvest, there is likely to be much suffering between now and then. But the most sanguine officials dare hope for no more than half the normal yield. This condition of affairs, coming after a succession of lean seasons, implies food at famine prices over the whole region. The finest race in India, the stalwart Jats, farmers of the Punjab, will be among the greatest sufferers. The British Government has not been obliged to face such a calamity since the great Indian famine of 1877, when, in spite of the expenditure of something like $55,000,000, five and a quarter millions of people perished from actual starvation or from diseases with which a famine-stricken population is certain to be afflicted. However, the Indian administration is much better able to fight a famine than it was twenty years ago. There has been an enormous development of facilities for transportation, and throughout the threatened area public works have been projected which will give employment to many thousand sufferers. We are assured that efforts will be made to provide every one with the means of earning, at least, a bare subsistence and to prevent loss of life, but this does not promise immunity from almost intolerable deprivation and misery.

The French in Madagascar. The French have apparently determined to carry things with a high hand in Madagascar, and as a proof of their authority and severity have executed Rainandrianampandry, the Hova minister of interior. He was tried and condemned by court martial on the charge of complicity in the rebellion now in progress. The news is surprising, as the distinguished Hova was high in favor two years ago, when he was named by General Duchesne for the position of prime minister but was finally appointed minister of the interior. His recent execution is not the only manifestation of the present attitude of France toward the Hova officials. Prince Ratsimananga, the Queen's uncle, has been put to death on the same charge. The prime minister has "resigned," and a telegram from General Gallieni, dated Oct. 30, says "there will be no successor." When General Gallieni arrived at the capital in September he politely declined to be introduced to the Queen, saying with lordly dignity: "I consider that my position requires the Queen to call on me first. When I am a little more at leisure I will inform her when she may come to greet the representative of France." Mission work has been necessarily almost at a standstill and what its future will be no one can predict, but the London Missionary Society maintains its attitude of patience and hopefulness. The sentiment recently expressed in the French Chamber in the form of a resolution demanding that the English missionaries be expelled from Algiers bodes no good, we fear, to Protestant missions in French colonies in Africa.

Out-going Missionaries. Unique in the history of the Church Missionary Society was the valedictory dismissal this fall of 145 outgoing workers including missionaries' wives. Its uniqueness consists not in the size and enthusiasm of the public demonstrations, but in the fact that the whole body of new recruits sent out this year, seventy-eight in number, is to be supported by special gifts over and above the regular contributions to the society. Eight go out at their own charges, the expenses of six are assumed by colonial associations and fifty-seven have been appropriated as "own missionaries" by various individual friends or groups of friends or parishes with whom they were connected. The remainder, though not assigned, were similarly provided for. Thirty-five of the new workers are unmarried women. The sermon by the Bishop of London was based on the text, "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day." He made it plain that it is not God's purpose that the work of preaching the gospel to all mankind should be completed speedily, declaring that "it is in the wonderful slowness of the divine operations that we are to read the signs of the divine hand quite as much as—it seems to me even more than—in those rapid changes which to careless apprehension seem more plainly to prove the divine interposition. To maintain a steady purpose long after generations have passed away that once understood it, long after generations have passed away that saw the beginning of it and perhaps were allowed then to take a part in it, still to go on, and from century to century still, in spite of all the frailties and failures of man, to continue the one determined work is, indeed, something supernatural." This is a word of encouragement which we at home who are impatient for rapid results need as much as the workers on the field. The London Missionary Society also has been holding large valedictory meetings and eighteen new missionaries have been sent forth. This does not, however, mean a corresponding increase of the staff of workers as with one exception the new recruits are going to fill vacancies, actual or prospective, caused by death and changes.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Dec. 6–12. How to Strengthen Our Faith in Christianity. Mark 9: 14–29.

Find out what it has done and is doing in the world. Read the Acts of the Apostles, the annals of the early church, the biographies of confessors and martyrs, of missionaries and evangelists. Discover the sources of the best art, the noblest music which has ever been produced. Discern on the pages of the world's finest literature the touch and coloring of Christianity. See how it has blossomed in hospitals, schools, charitable institutions and beautiful philanthropies in the waste places of the earth; recognize it as the salt and savor of society. But it is by observing the effects of the religion of Jesus in individual lives that we become still more convinced of its reality and power. And we need not go back to what are considered the heroic ages of the church. Why not recognize the present effects of Christianity in lives close to ours, lives that are patient and strong, lives out of which the demons of unrest and passion have been cast by the grace of God?

A better understanding of Christ strengthens our faith in Christianity. Approach through patient, systematic daily study of the gospels the matchless figure around whom men and women gathered, conscious that they were in the presence of one whom God had sent. The character of Christ grows greater and more exhaustless the closer we approach it. No one who comes into intimate relations with him doubts the divine power of his religion or its ability forever to hold the allegiance of men.

Try Christianity yourself. This is the surest way to test its value. Are its precepts and its inspirations of any use to you in daily life? It proposes a certain definite program. It seeks to foster in you the humble, obedient mind, the pure unselfish heart. It would make your conscience sensitive to right and wrong. It would put iron into your will. It would enlarge your thought of God and man. Above all, it would furnish you with power to realize high ideals. Try it fairly, persistently, for a day, a week, a year, a lifetime, and see if you do not believe in it with all your heart.

Parallel verses: Gen. 22: 17; Isa. 45: 21–23; Ps. 72; 17; Acts 3: 16; 4: 10–12; Rom. 14: 11; Rev. 7: 9, 10.

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING.

Topic, Nov. 29–Dec. 5. Intolerance and Charity. 1 Cor. 13; Gal. 6: 1–5.

What Christian love is; how it prompts us to treat weak and burdened ones; and to bear our own burdens.

Literature

AS TO VERSATILITY.

A little while ago a dearth of short stories was complained of by editors and publishers. Their demand evidently has created a supply, for the tenor of their complaint now is that they cannot get much of anything else than short stories and that they desire above all things good essays. But do not therefore sit you down instantly, dear reader, in order to compose an essay or two. Whether it be easier, or, rather, less difficult, to write a short story or an essay let those alone testify who can write each, and have written them, and have had them published, or at any rate accepted. It is no trifle to compose a successful story, short or long, in these days of excellent workmanship in that line. But probably there is even graver peril of the commonplace or the grandiose, the maximum of words with the minimum of meaning, or the seeming to have said a thing quite different from that intended, in the alluring periods of the essay. A select few are equal to the demands of both, but not many authors can be termed expert in either. And it is noticeable that when one has succeeded in the one direction he usually makes his attempt in the other. But he seldom wins equal credit in each. Is not the reason that the one is easier for him than the other—easier in that it is a form of literature for which he has instinctively the greater inclination and which he can cultivate with the more enthusiasm? It is largely a matter of sympathy. One man writes short stories well because he wants to write them. He is inwardly impelled to write them. They almost seem to write themselves. But when he sits down to compose an essay, the impulse fails. He writes because he thinks it would be a fine thing to vary his style, to be the author of an essay. So his product is more or less mechanical. It lacks spontaneity and zest. The competent essayist sometimes makes a similar mistake in the reverse fashion.

The moral of it all is, be natural! Write only what you feel impelled to write, not what you think it would look well to have written. He who can write prose and verse, philosophy and biography, short stories and essays, or more than one of any other kinds of literature with equal facility and success is to be congratulated. But most of us are wise to study what we can do best and to keep to that.

BOOK REVIEWS.

VICTOR HUGO'S LETTERS.

M. Paul Meurice has edited a collection of something over two hundred letters by the great French poet, dramatist and novelist, and they make a noteworthy book. The author wrote with a freedom which not every one exhibits, even in correspondence with intimates, and his letters are addressed to his family, to Sainte-Beuve, the famous critic who was long his close friend, and to a number of miscellaneous acquaintances. Some of the communications are so unimportant that it was hardly worth while to include them, and there is a great diversity of interest and importance among the remainder. They all were written long ago, in the earlier portion of the author's life. The latest, so far as we observe, is dated 1845. No intimation of another volume is given but of course much of the most valuable correspondence of M. Hugo must have been written during the subsequent years.

The book has proved something of a disappointment. There is in it very little which is distinguishing. Nearly every letter might have been written by almost any other man in Hugo's circumstances, and the circumstances seldom were strikingly peculiar. To his parents and children he wrote brightly and tenderly, to his literary friends with frequent allusions to their productions or his own, and to acquaintances with courteous friendliness. But he wrote for the most part only about common things and in an ordinary manner. Even the subsequently colossal vanity of the man, which had some justification, but which became a characteristic as conspicuous as it was unpleasant, had not more than begun to display itself, and reveals itself only in complaints of the alleged combination of fellow-authors, publishers, critics, etc., against his success.

The revelation here afforded of the warm heart of M. Hugo, and of his sturdiness as a friend, is vivid and pleasant. His intimacy with Sainte-Beuve at one time suffered a check. Whether the latter became a little tired of it is hardly to be inferred yet the thought occurs to the reader. Hugo must have been a trifle oppressive sometimes as a friend. At any rate their intimacy was interrupted in a degree. But Hugo wrote to Sainte-Beuve several warm-hearted letters which regret the fact which they nevertheless recognize frankly and assure their object that he is none the less truly beloved. The letters to the children also are charming utterances of paternal tenderness and playfulness.

The volume has no index—a serious defect—but is printed finely. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $3.00.]

STORIES.

Slum life in London often has been described of late, but seldom more faithfully than by Arthur Morrison in his new story, The Child of the Jago [H. S. Stone & Co. $1.50]. The Jago is a portion of the Bethnal Green region, and the inhabitants are the lowest of the low. The hero is a boy, bright, and in many ways admirable, but the victim of the oppressive conditions of his life. The story must have been studied from facts with painstaking scrupulousness, and its author possesses a remarkable power of picturesque narrative. It is full of interest, albeit it is sad and almost depressing, for it reveals the practical impossibility of better things to such a lad as the hero. Apart from its large interest as a tale it points a most solemn moral. It reveals afresh the terrible difficulties which must be overcome in the effort to improve the condition of thousands in our large cities, and, if it have a defect, it is that it presents a picture too uniformly gloomy, for in all such neighborhoods there are a few who, by offered aid or inherent energy, or both, manage to rise above the evils which beset them. There is hardly a gleam of brightness in the story, yet we would not repel the intending reader, for he will find it unusually powerful, pathetic and interesting. If it serve to quicken the enthusiasm and to render more wise and efficient the methods of those who seek to save the wretched—and it ought to have this result—it will abundantly justify its existence quite apart from its power as a narrative.

Another Scotch story belongs with those which have recently become so deservedly popular. It is Robert Urquhart [R. F. Fenno & Co. $1.00], by Gabriel Setoun. Without ranking in the very highest class of these stories, it is nevertheless a spirited, realistic and highly entertaining book. The Scotch dialect appears freely but not to the extent of being oppressive. The scene is chiefly a little Scotch village and the hero is the schoolmaster, and the parish affairs, with their amusing and sometimes touching characteristics, form the body of the story. It is high toned and helpful throughout and enjoyable from cover to cover.——Not All the King's Horses [Cassell Publishing Co. 50 cents] is the hardly intelligible title of a short society story, belonging to the "Unknown" Library, the scene of which is laid in the city of Washington. It is a narrative of social ambitions and is neither specially edifying nor entertaining, yet it is certainly readable and has distinct merit as a character sketch of certain types of life.——Fireside Sketches from Swedish Life [Thomas Nelson & Sons. 50 cents], by Mrs. Woods Baker, contains five short stories which portray the simple, homely but dignified and admirable aspects of Swedish family life. The author is familiar with the country described and draws her pictures with considerable skill. The book is unpretending but attractive.

Two volumes of Historical Tales [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25 each], by Charles Morris, contain modern renderings, the one of a dozen Greek narratives and the other of three or four times as many Roman. The author describes how Troy was taken, Theseus and Ariadne, the Ring of Polycrates, the Retreat of the Ten Thousand, How Brave Horatius Kept the Bridge, the Caudine Forks, How Hannibal Crossed the Alps, etc. His style is clear and picturesque, and the two volumes are illustrated and will serve well to awaken or quicken interest in ancient history. They are admirably adapted for the household library.——Mr. Anthony Hope's recent sketches, most, if not all, of which have appeared in one or another magazine, have been collected into a volume, The Heart of Princess Osra [F. A. Stokes Co. $1.50]. They have a merry zest of their own which is now widely appreciated, and the dash and daring of the successive plots add interest to the historic pictures of old-time life in continental Europe.

One of the Visconti [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents], by Eva W. Brodhead, is a short story but instinct with vitality and interest. It goes nearer to the foundations of life than many more elaborate stories, and its facts and suggestions alike combine to make strong impressions. The scene is laid chiefly in Italy, although Americans are prominent actors, and it is a pretty little book.——A score of Robert Barr's short stories are grouped together in a volume entitled Revenge [F. A. Stokes Co. $1.25]. They are lively and sometimes quite effective sketches, which do not go very far beneath the surface of things. Many depend upon some sudden turn of events for their outcome, and they are eminently readable.——Mr. C. M. Skinner has compiled two beautiful volumes of Myths and Legends of Our Own Land [J. B. Lippincott Co. $3.00]. Many people will be surprised at the number of them and many more will be heartily glad of their preservation in this attractive form. Among them are found Rip Van Winkle, Evangeline, Mogg Megone, The Skeleton in Armor, The New Haven Storm Ship, and many less widely known but equally deserving of note. Alike in substance and in form the two volumes will make a charming holiday gift.

JUVENILE.

Mother Molly [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00], by Frances M. Peard, is a dainty little Devonshire story of the latter part of the last century. Without attempting to point a direct moral it represents the heroine, a sweet and self-sacrificing elder sister, as taking the mother's place in the home so gracefully and touchingly that no one can fail to feel the beauty of doing good to others. But merely as a story it is well planned and carried out.——Another charming little book is Probable Sons [F. H. Revell Co. 50 cents], by the author of Eric's Good News. It tells again the familiar tale of the recall of a wandering Christian, this time an English society man, to his faith and obedience through the unconscious and pathetic ministry of a little girl, the sweetness of whose character and the sincerity of whose love for God proved, as they so often have proved, irresistible. It will find a warm welcome.——A Pilgrim Child [American Sunday School Union. 75 cents], by Theodora C. Elmslie, is pleasantly fanciful and helpfully spiritual. If it be almost too unreal to hold the most matter-of-fact class of readers, there is another class, and a very large one, who will delight in it and find benefit in it. It is issued in very tasteful form.

George Manville Fenn is the author of The Black Tor [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.50], in which with adroit wisdom he teaches the boys and girls, not less than any of their elders into whose hands the book may fall, the absurdity and wickedness of distrust and enmity. The story is an exciting account of the yielding of an ancient feud between two west of England families to the at first half-involuntary but at last cordially intended efforts of two high spirited boys to bring about peace and good will instead of strife. The inherent improbabilities in portions of the story are conspicuous, but the main current runs naturally, and it deserves to be one of the author's most popular books.——Mr. W. H. Frost, in The Court of King Arthur [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50], has grouped in a pleasant succession a number of the stories of the Round Table of King Arthur and has told them with skill and with zest, and the boys and girls will relish the book highly. It is one of the best of its sort which we have seen. It is also handsomely printed. ——Tecumseh's Young Braves [Lee & Shepard. $1.50], by E. T. Tomlinson, belongs to the War of 1812 series and is a story of the Creek war. Tecumseh was a famous Indian hero and there is much in its story which renders it worth the attentive study of modern times. This book, although written for the young, gives attention to the historical side of the case and also makes a graphic and enjoyable story.—— A Cape May Diamond [Roberts Bros. $1.50], by Evelyn Raymond, is pre-eminently a story for girls, but the boys also will like it. It is breezy and wholesome, full of incident and adventure, but also pointing half a dozen solid morals and even making a decidedly religious impression, but without any parade of doing so. It is thoroughly charming.

Andrew Lang's The Animal Story Book [Longmans, Green & Co. $2.00] is fascinating in every respect. It is a book which appeals primarily, of course, to children, and yet their elders will find time devoted to it to have been far from wasted. It is instructive, yet the instruction is so sugared with entertainment and the author's style is so delightful that the instruction is imbibed almost unconsciously. It is not, like a number of other modern books about animals, an attempt to tell fairy stories, but is the result of close study of the characteristics of various creatures, and it blends the grave and the amusing most skillfully. It is illustrated freely and well and will make a Christmas gift in the foremost rank in respect to popularity.——Readers of Sparrow, the Tramp, and its charming successors, by Lillie F. Wesselhoefft, will welcome gladly her new book, Jerry, the Blunderer [Roberts Bros. $1.25]. Children and animals are the actors in her plot, as usual, and she has displayed her accustomed skill in making them talk and act so that the boys and girls who open the book will be reluctant to lay it aside unfinished. The illustrations also deserve commendation. This, too, should be kept in mind as Christmas draws near.

Ottilie A. Liljencrantz is the author of The Scrape that Jack Built [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.25]. This is very sure to be a popular favorite, for the boys and girls are real and so are their scrapes, and the fun in the book is not more amusing than the serious teaching is wholesome. Lessons of genuine manhood will be learned from its pages without any conscious effort on the part of the reader.——Walter Gibbs, the Young Boss, and Other Stories [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50], by E. W. Thomson, contains sketches which have appeared in the Youth's Companion and have won their welcome by the boys and girls already. They are worth preserving in their permanent form, and in many ways they are inspiring as well as enjoyable.——A Secret of the Sea [J. S. Ogilvie Pub. Co. 50 cents], by Cornelia M. Parsons, is written in a sprightly style and describes events which happened in the early part of the century. It is not without interest but more readable than it is important.——Mrs. Ella Farman Pratt, editor of Babyland, has collected several pleasant little stories for the younger children, illustrated daintily and expressively and with some full-page colored pictures, into a book called Happy Children [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50]. It is one of the books which children three or four years old will delight to have read to them and to turn over for its pictures. It is exceptionally enjoyable from cover to cover.

Jack and His Brother [Thomas Nelson & Sons. 50 cents], by Mrs. Austin Dobson, is dedicated to everybody under four, and is intended to be read to the younger children, although those considerably above that age will enjoy it as much as any. It is a pretty little story and pleasantly illustrated.—— From the same publishers comes King Mathias and the Beggar Boy [50 cents], by Selina Gaye. It is a translation from the Hungarian of Baron Jósika, and well deserves to be made known to young English readers.——More Nonsense for the Same Bodies as Before [E & J. B. Young & Co. $1.00], written and illustrated by A. Nobody, certainly merits the title Nonsense, and we question whether such nonsense is quite worth putting before the public. It is not specially droll, and the pictures, which are far superior to the text, although amusing are hardly to be ranked with the best work of their sort. Those who enjoy mere absurdity and drollery which have no suggestions of anything higher will find this after their own hearts. Others will not care for it.

REPRINTS.

Two more issues have appeared in Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s beautiful Riverside edition of the writings of Mrs. Stowe. One is Dred, in two volumes [$1.50 each], which never attained the popularity of its famous predecessor, Uncle Tom's Cabin, yet which in itself is striking and has been a deservedly favorite story. The other is her Stories, Sketches and Studies [$1.50], which contains a miscellaneous collection of her shorter productions, some of which illustrate her thoughtfulness, vivacity and power of touching the human heart almost as successfully as either of her more important works. The edition is printed tastefully and is suited to be the favorite library edition of her works.

Three volumes, long familiar to the reading public, by Rev. J. H. Ingraham, have been reissued by Messrs. Roberts Brothers. One is The Throne of David [$2.00], which has for its subject the reign of the great king down to the time of the rebellion of Prince Absalom. Another is The Pillar of Fire [$2.00], which deals with Israel in bondage. The third is The Prince of the House of David [$2.00], which treats of the life and teachings of our Lord. The series, if lacking somewhat of the accuracy which modern scholarship demands in historical narratives, nevertheless so abounds in picturesque interest and in spiritual fervor that it has had for years a large popularity, and this edition has been revised and corrected, so that it is not so open to the criticisms which have been made justly upon the earlier editions. Many a child has owed lasting religious impressions to these books and has gained from them a permanent interest in a department of literature which otherwise might have been neglected. They are issued in a very attractive form and have been felicitously illustrated by Victor Searles.

Rudyard Kipling made his reputation, primarily, by his account of English military life in India, and seven of his most popular tales have been reissued in a volume, Soldier Stories [Macmillan Co. $1.50], with graphic illustrations. Among these stories are The Drums of the Fore and Aft, The Courting of Dinah Shadd, and The Incarnation of Krishna Mulvaney. They are not the less thrilling for having been printed before. Whatever faults they may have, and they certainly are not free from faults, they throb with a remarkable power of appreciation and description and seldom have been surpassed, if, indeed, they ever have been equaled in their own way. The kind of humanity described is not the most elevated, but it is humanity, after all, and every reader finds himself instinctively recognizing his kinship with it. The comical element, we hardly need add, blends with the severe and even tragic effectively.

MISCELLANEOUS.

When one recalls the fact that Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke is nearly ninety years old, the sudden leaps from the important to the unimportant in her reminiscences are accounted for easily. My Long Life [Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.00] is an autobiographical sketch in which many of the friendships and occurrences of her long and most interesting life are described. A daughter of Vincent Novello, the eminent musician and composer, she was early thrown into the choicest musical and literary society of England, and has known personally an unusually large number of the men and women best worth knowing during the last sixty years. This sketch of her life history is written with a vivacity, fascination and enthusiasm ordinarily characterizing only the young, and both as the story of a charming career and for its numerous entertaining episodes and pictures it appeals to a wide circle of readers. Mrs. Cowden-Clarke's picture and several others are included.

The out-of-door library is enriched by a volume called Angling [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50], in which are gathered eight papers by Dr. L. M. Yale, Judge Robert Grant and others which have appeared in Scribner's Magazine on fish and fishing. The authors are genuine sportsmen and also abundantly capable of graphic description, and the pictures which enliven their pages add to the attractiveness of the volume, which in its way is somewhat novel and which is sure of many readers.——Mr. J. L. Cowles offers a practical solution of the railroad problem in his book, A General Freight and Passenger Post [G. P. Putnam's Sons. 75 cents]. His proposition is that the postal department shall take charge of freight and passengers, that any objections which may be suggested to such a transfer are answerable satisfactorily, and that great public benefit in more than one direction must result. The book is thoughtful and well written, and all students of the great railroad problem of the present day ought to read it and weigh well its suggestions. We are not prepared quite yet to indorse them, but they certainly deserve study.

Captain Cook's Voyages Around the World [Thomas Nelson & Son. $2 00] has been a classic for generations among books of travel, exploration and adventure. This new and handsome edition, with an introductory life by M. B. Synge, is adapted to continue to demonstrate the interest and value of the book for a long time to come. It is a book which the boys always have read with avidity and which their elders, even among learned men, have not hesitated to pronounce a work of permanent merit and importance. Captain Cook's services to the world were such as the present appreciates perhaps even more fully than his contemporaries. The story of his life is an incentive to ambitious young men, and this edition of his famous narrative must have a wide circulation.

Cake Decorations and Desserts [Arnold & Co. $1.50], by C. H. King, deals with the department of ornamental cookery. The author has large experience, out of which he has made up his book, which is enriched in a manner somewhat unusual in volumes of the sort by full page and other diagrams and designs. Ornamental cooking is perhaps less common in the household than in confectionary stores, yet any housewife will be glad of many of the recipes and suggestions contained in these pages, and all confectioners will appreciate it at its true value.——Dr. W. T. Harris's address before the National Education Society at Buffalo this year, on Horace Mann [C. W. Bardeen. 50 cents] is issued in a small book and well merits perservation in permanent form.

NOTES.

—— Mr. Barrie's forthcoming book, Margaret Ogilvy, is largely a sketch of his mother and reveals much of his own early life.

—— Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.'s new edition of Thackeray's works is to have in each volume a preface by his daughter, Mrs. Richmond Ritchie.

—— John Murray, says The Publishers' Weekly, is reported to be the only British publisher who never consents to bring out a book at the author's risk.

—— The executors of the late William Morris are to sell his library. It is not large but is very valuable, containing many illuminated manuscripts, missals, psalters and early woodcut books.

—— The F. H. Revell Co. has secured the plates, publication rights, etc., of the authorized editions of Rev. Andrew Murray's popular devotional works and will issue them in this country henceforth.

—— Miss Harriet Monroe's claim for $5,000 damages against the New York World for publishing prematurely and without authority her World's Fair Ode has been approved by the United States Supreme Court.

—— We are informed by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, its publishers, that there is a good cloth edition of Wendte's Students' Diary for sale at fifty cents. The price which we named in our recent notice, $1 25, is that of a more ornamental edition.

—— Recently the papers announced the death of Dr. Edward Haven Jackson of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., the author of these lines inscribed on President Garfield's tomb:

Life's race well run,
Life's work well done,
Life's victory won,
Now cometh rest.

It was stated that Dr. Jackson wrote these lines several years ago on the occasion of the death of a family friend. The Christian World, London, a few weeks ago announced the death of Mr. John Mills at Bowdon, Eng., the author of the lines which the Princess of Wales placed on the grave of her son, the late Duke of Clarence:

His work well done,
His race well run,
His crown well won,
Here let him rest.

Mr. Mills wrote these lines in memory of his brother. It is a curious coincidence that two men in two different countries should write poems so similar, that in both countries they should be put to a national use, and that the authors should die within a few weeks of each other.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, NOV. 20.

The hymn, "Sweet hour of prayer," introduced the topic, "Lord, teach us to pray," selected by the leader, Mrs. J. A. Haskell, who read many promises bearing upon this subject with the conviction that "the Bible does not so much command us to pray, but rather gives us the privilege," and that our great need is to learn how to pray.

Mrs. Goodell spoke upon the same theme and recommended Andrew Murray's With Christ in the School of Prayer as a good companion for one's Bible. A brief article from the Assembly Herald was read, entitled Prayer in Faith, the gist of which was that "we must draw the line between faith in prayer and prayer in faith."

Mrs. Wheeler drew from her own experience in Harpoot the lesson that prayer is often heard even before it is uttered, and urged the gaining of the blessed assurance which will enable one to say "I know." She said, "Armenia lies bleeding, but it is to rise again, and we may ask of you more than ever before." As she described the condition of the host of orphan children it seemed a very small matter to grant her modest request to save a cup of cold water from the Thanksgiving dinner for these suffering ones.

Mrs. Kellogg alluded to Mrs. Goodell's recent suggestion with regard to Christmas gifts. Miss Child, calendar in hand, went through the list of missionaries in Japan mentioned during the week with interesting reminiscences of her recent visits in their homes, of occupying Miss Adams's room in a Japanese house in Okayama, while she visited Mrs. Pettee and had to lay aside her shoes every time she entered the house, and of her disappointment in not being able to go to Niigata to see Miss Clara Brown.

Mrs. De Forest paid an appreciative tribute to the value of Miss Bradshaw's work at Sendai. Mrs Davis of Newton suggested that the boys and girls in Sunday school might easily be influenced by their teachers to make a Thanksgiving offering for the poor children of Armenia. "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" was the burden of many a prayer.

A Union Young People's Missionary Rally will be held at People's Temple, Boston, Nov. 29, at 4.15 P. M. Young People's Unions and Societies of all the denominations are urged to be represented in large numbers. The speakers will be Rev. H. P. Beach, six years a missionary in China, Rev. C. L. Goodell and R. E. Lewis, traveling secretary student volunteer movement. The Harvard Y. M. C. A. Quartet will sing.

Steady Growth of Our Armenian Orphans' Fund.

Contributions Received up to Nov. 24 Lift the Total to $1,802.23.

Last week we acknowledged the receipt of $500 as the first response from over fifty givers to our appeal of the previous week in behalf of the thousands of destitute orphans in Armenia. This week we are glad to be able to announce a further aggregate contribution of over $1,300, making the total up to Tuesday morning $1,802,23. This second list of contributors shows how widespread is the interest in this movement. Our original appeal was to our own constituency, and we shall naturally rely chiefly upon them for the aid which will make this fund a valuable factor in counteracting the ravages wrought by the Turks, but it is cheering that the appeal has found favor with a number of persons connected with other denominations than our own. It is equally gratifying that gifts are not the offering of any one class of society, but that, if we may judge from the letters accompanying them, men and women of abundant means and those who are obliged day by day to exercise the most scrupulous economy are desirous of being enrolled in this list of givers. The sums credited to the Endeavor Societies and to other organizations give an idea of what can be done by the banding together of those who would not consider their individual contributions of sufficient size to be forwarded alone.

We suppose it is generally understood by this time that The Congregationalist wishes in this matter to act simply as the medium between American givers and the missionaries of the American Board in Turkey. We have already pointed out how economical and immediately effective this method of contribution is. Miss Clara Barton in her report, published Monday, of the results of her mission of mercy in Asia Minor, after stating that unless relief comes at least 50,000 persons will probably die of starvation before the first of May, 1897, goes on to say that "None of us have found any better medium for the dispensation of charitable relief than the faithful missionaries already in the country."

We have no doubt that at various centers in Armenia our missionaries are eagerly waiting for the aid of such a fund as this. The $500 acknowledged last week was cabled to Harpoot, and, after consultation with the officers of the American Board, it has been decided to cable $1,000, representing the second group of givers, to Constantinople, whence it will be at once sent to places where conditions are as appalling as at Harpoot. Van, Erzroom, Bitlis, Marash and Aintab and other centers ought to be furnished with from $500 to $1,000 apiece in order that the orphans in the vicinity of those cities may be properly cared for. The pictures on this page, furnished by Miss Wheeler, whose mother writes the accompanying article, do not represent the actual objects of our benefactions but rather the product of missionary activity heretofore. They will serve the purpose, however, as showing what educative and Christianizing influences can do for Armenian boys and girls when brought under the tuition of missionaries. The thousands now wandering about, half-naked and forsaken, can be transformed into as good looking and promising children as those in the pictures, provided help goes to them at once.

"The self-sacrifice of the Christian is the echo of the self-sacrifice of Christ," says Phillips Brooks, and it is the privilege of us all to enter more heartily into the mind and heart of our Master by availing ourselves of this particularly appealing opportunity of ministering to his little ones in far-away Armenia. Let the good work go on, and may another week bring at least a doubling of funds to be placed at the disposal of the Board.

"Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these, even these least, ye did it unto me."

THE PLEA OF AN EYE-WITNESS.

It will be remembered that last summer Dr. C. H Wheeler of Harpoot, with his wife and daughter, all of whom had been under the service of the American Board in Armenia, arrived in this country after having passed through the terrible scenes connected with the massacres. They took up their residence in Auburndale, where Dr. Wheeler died a few weeks ago. Mrs. Wheeler and her daughter are deeply interested in the movement for the relief of the orphans, and the former writes us as follows:

Would that personally I might plead with the readers of The Congregationalist in behalf of the orphans of Armenia. One of the oldest churches of Christendom has been preserved through centuries so to suffer from fearful massacre that we feel that we cannot listen to more horrors. Yet the half has not been told. Much of it cannot be set before the public.

The Armenian is a lover of his home and of his country. His mountains and valleys are as dear to him as those of Switzerland to the Swiss. There are few in this country today who would not go back if they could be protected. Through great persecutions they have held on to their Christianity.

Ignorance has to some extent extinguished their light, but the fire is there, though often buried beneath the ashes. This Christianity has had a wonderful influence over them. It has made them a religious nation, very different from many Oriental people. I am often asked, "Are they not liars and thieves?" and can say most emphatically, "No." They are a Biblical nation. When we opened the way for the Bible (the modern Bible) we were greatly interested to see how easily they understood it and took in its great truths.

I did not take my pen to plead for the nation, but for the thousands of orphans whom the awful massacres of the last year have left to suffer and perish. Sometimes I feel it would be better for these orphans if they had been slaughtered with their parents.

The following case happened near my own home. A mother was butchered. A Koord entered the home for plunder. Her three children were crying, the youngest clinging to the mother's breast while her blood covered his garments. The Koord had a heart and left, determining to go after dark and take these children to the missionary. He returned to find a more cruel one had entered, killed the little ones and piled them upon the body of the mother.

Since coming to this country and hearing the complaints against the Armenians, I have almost cried out in agony, "Would to God all the children left orphans had fared like these!" Thousands on the cold mountains of Armenia will die during the present winter. Our Father in heaven will not shut them out of the many mansions, and they, too, will swell the great company who cry day and night under the altar. Others will be left—where? Will the Congregational churches, who have had such a promising work in Eastern Turkey, leave these without a home?

I have seen them pinched with cold, with a piece of bread in their hands, given by the missionary, their little bare feet on the snow or frozen ground. What pitiful faces! No wonder one of these, on her way to Harpoot, said, "I must lie down," even when she had almost reached the city where she would be cared for. But the angels lovingly bore her to her Father's home.

Will you not open your cloaks, make them a little wider, and take these orphans in? I know that the causes to help are many and grand, but I only ask that you give for this work a little thank offering that you shall save out of your Thanksgiving and Christmas festivities.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

Success to the union revival services so effectively planned in St. Louis. The fellowship of neighboring churches conduces to a spirit of unity and enthusiasm highly favorable to this work, and the service of a local pastor called out by such an audience is often fully as valuable as that of a professional evangelist.

A United Presbyterian church in Minnesota calls the pastor of a Congregational church which is obliged to discontinue services for lack of funds, and thus attracts a large share of his congregation. Truly, co-operation rather than rivalry is the watchword of the hour.

"Denominational responsibility" has an inspiring ring in it, and suggests that the lately organized New Jersey Union has realized the lack which so many churches and bodies of churches have felt but have not always faced so efficiently.

The people of a Massachusetts country town consider that if their meeting house is good enough to serve the purposes of a town house, it is worthy of refitting and modernizing for continued service as its house of worship.

An invitation which reaches out into the highways and byways as that from a New Hampshire church is a step in the right direction for an enlarged influence in the community.

A pastor who leaves behind him so many warm friends as one who has just bade farewell to Minneapolis is likely to be a social power in his new parish.

It is not often that a church setting out to make renovations on its building accomplishes such a result as is noted in an item from the Bay State.

The solidarity of the State is appealed to by Congregationalists in northern Minnesota this week.

A NEW BOSTON PASTOR.

Just six months ago Union Church, and all Boston with it, released regretfully Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton at the call of the First Church, Detroit. The epoch of its patience in waiting for his successor has closed, and the thread of its history of pastorates is again taken up under the lead of Rev. Samuel L. Loomis.

The council, of which Rev. Smith Baker, D.D., was moderator, met Nov. 18. It included thirty-one churches of the larger Boston sisterhood. The pastor accepted the Creed of 1883, which is also the creed of Union Church, and his further pronounced utterances left no obstacle before the council to unanimous action favoring his settlement. Before the evening service a social season intervened, in the course of which neighboring pastors of churches of other denominations spoke congratulatory words. The later congregation was large. The sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. R. R. Meredith, of Brooklyn, a former pastor; the installing prayer was offered by Rev. Elihu Loomis, father of the new pastor; the charge to the pastor was given by Rev. Dr. G. A. Gordon; the right hand of fellowship by Rev. W. R. Campbell; and the charge to the people by Rev. F. H. Page. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton sent a greeting to his successor accompanied by a beautiful bouquet of flowers, which occasioned repeated comment.

Mr. Loomis was born in Littleton in this State forty years ago. His father and grandfather were Congregational clergymen. His father, Rev. E. G. Loomis, and his mother were formerly members of Union Church, but are residents of Bedford. Mr. Loomis graduated at Amherst in 1877, and studied theology at Yale and Andover. His first charge was at Newport, Ky., where he worked under the auspices of the Home Missionary Society, and after five years of hard labor succeeded in building a church and leaving it free of debt. On leaving Kentucky he traveled in Europe for two years, and when he returned he gave a course of lectures at Andover, which were afterward published under the title of Modern Cities and Their Religious Problems. This work has had a large sale and is used as a text-book in the Chicago University and elsewhere. Mr. Loomis next became assistant pastor of the Tompkins Avenue Church in Brooklyn, N. Y., with Dr. Meredith, where he worked nearly three years. He resigned to accept a call to the Belleville Avenue Church in Newark, N. J. During his stay at Newark the church became one of the most influential in that city. He was active in the temperance cause and in work for young people. He established a club for working girls which has a house of its own and a membership of 400.

A conservative estimate puts the sum of the contributions of Union Church, during its seventy-four years' existence, to foreign missions at $200,000, and $300,000 to home missions and other charities. The present membership is over 550. The congregation which greeted Mr. Loomis last Sunday was especially large and gratifying, and the preacher gave a fitting message for the opening of the new pastorate.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Andover.

Dr. Wallace Nutting of Providence addressed the Society of Inquiry Nov. 11 on the work of the minister in the pulpit and the parish. After his address he answered questions for nearly an hour. The society held its first meeting of the year, conducted solely by students, Nov. 19. The subject, The Work of the Jesuits, was intended to supplement the course on missions to be given by Dr. Torrey the second half-year.——On Wednesday of last week a short address was given by Mr. Calloway, assistant principal of the Tuskegee school, and a quartet from the school sang plantation melodies. ——The seminary observed the "quiet day" suggested by the Evangelical Alliance by means of a union prayer meeting.——Last Friday evening Professor Churchill gave a reception to the Senior Class.——Rev. C. M. Clark of Haverhill preached in the seminary church recently.

Hartford.

Five days are allowed for the Thanksgiving recess this year.——In accordance with the call of the Evangelical Alliance for a special day of prayer, the faculty and students held a joint prayer meeting last Tuesday evening.——At the prayer meeting Friday evening Mr. E. W. Capen gave a stirring report of the meetings of the Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance held at Chicago.

Yale.

The Senior address in Marquand Chapel last week Wednesday was by M. B. Fisher on Infant Baptism: Its Ground and Significance to the Church.——The missionary society was addressed at its last meeting by Rev. W. A. P. Martin, D. D., of Imperial College, China, on China, the Stronghold of Paganism.——The opening lecture of the Leonard Bacon Club course was given Nov. 18 by Rev. E. E. Hale, D. D., of Boston on Co-operation in Christian Work Between Minister and People. Dr. Hale treated the work of the church under the heads of Education, Hospitality, Charity and Worship. The next lecture will be by Dr. T. T. Munger on Jonathan Edwards.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

ME.—Waldo Conference met at Frankfort. The sermon was by Mr. B. A. Lucas of Bangor Seminary. Topics were: The Christian as a Citizen, Enforcement of Maine Law, The Christian in the Home as a Friend, The Church and Amusements, Men, The Children, Religious Outlook in Waldo County, What Shall We Do This Winter?

O.—The Lake Shore Association, at its autumn meeting in Cleveland, Nov. 16, heard strong papers on Ministerial Supply and Demand. The facts presented were based on an extensive correspondence with home missionary superintendents, pastors and church clerks in several States. General testimony was that there is not, throughout the country, an oversupply of ministers. It was stated that there are but 10 vacant churches in the State.

S. D.—The sixteenth annual meeting of Central Association was held with the churches of Canova and Dover, Nov. 10-12. Though deep snow and cold weather precluded a large attendance, the meeting was full of interest and spiritual power, the devotional services being especially helpful. The sermon was by Rev. T. G. Langdale. Rev. W. A. Lyman read a thoughtful paper on Is the Church Losing Influence over the World? and the claims of home missions and Yankton College were strongly presented. Profitable discussion followed on Mutual Obligations of Pastor and People, Hard Times and Home Missions, Sunday School Work, Why Are There so Few Regular Attendants; Church Members; in the Prayer Meeting? Evangelistic Services and Methods in Ordinary Church Work. A new constitution was adopted.

CLUBS.

MASS.—The Connecticut Valley Club met in South Hadley for its November session. The subject was The Bible in the World of Today, with the topics: In the Home, Sunday School, Education, Literature and Preaching, and the Bible and Monuments. The addresses of the evening were by Rev. Dr. D. O. Mears on The Deathless Book, Rev. Paul Van Dyke on The Bible in Missions, Rev. G. G. Atkins on The Bible in Sociology, and Principal J. H. Sawyer on The Bible in Statesmanship. A concert by a New York string quartet was given as part of the program, under the auspices of Mount Holyoke College.

O.—The Cleveland Club had a fine attendance Nov. 16. J. G. W. Cowles, the only survivor of the original members, gave interesting reminiscences of the club's 21 years' history. Rev. W. R. Taylor, D. D., of Rochester, a brother of Rev. L. L. Taylor, was a guest of the club and gave an inspiring address on Life, Its Enrichment and Enjoyment.

MICH.—The Western Michigan Club met last with Plymouth Church, Grand Rapids. The papers were: Social Organization of the Church, Rev. A. M. Hyde, and Evangelistic Organization of the Church, Rev. W. C. Burns. Several toasts were responded to as echoes of the campaign. The principal address was Preaching to the Masses, by Rev. Morgan Wood.

MO.—The St. Louis Club held its meeting Nov. 16. The general topic was The Educational Interests of St. Louis. Prof. F. L. Soldan, superintendent of public schools, Miss M. C. McCulloch, supervisor of kindergartens, and F. M. Crunden, Esq., librarian of the public library, ably represented their several departments. The club elected its officers for the year to come. Mr. J. C. Birge of Pilgrim Church was chosen president and Mr. W. H. Bartholomew secretary.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

The Ministers' Meeting on Monday heard an instructive and helpful address on the use of the voice from Miss Helen M. Cole.

Brighton. Rev. A. A. Berle, D. D., sails this week for England, to be away until after Christmas. During his absence, which is in the interests of his health, Prof. G. F. Wright, who begins this week his course of lectures at the Lowell Institute, will supply the pulpit and conduct the prayer meetings.

Massachusetts.

CAMBRIDGE.—Pilgrim is renovating its building. The vestries have been repainted and carpeted and are to be furnished with chairs, and a new carpet is to be laid in the auditorium. Pledges were made last Sunday to the amount of nearly $1,900 for the work—fully as much as will be required. The new pastor, Rev. F. E. Ramsdell, begins work Dec. 1.

BROOKLINE.—Harvard. At a meeting last Sunday in the interests of Negro education, Pres. Booker T. Washington was the chief speaker, representing Tuskegee Normal School, Ala. He made an eloquent address.

NEWTON.—Eliot. The pastor has formed a club for the young men of the congregation, to be largely social and literary in its aims.——Center last Sunday took up a contribution of $200 for the city hospital, and on Nov. 15 made a special offering of $500 to the A. M. A.——Auburndale. The annual meeting, Nov. 17, was celebrated as usual with a supper and roll-call, and was greatly enjoyed for its social features and for the reports from all the organizations. There were present 170. The roll-call was a reminder of the large number of members at work in widely scattered fields. An interesting address was given last week Sunday afternoon by Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth to a large congregation, largely on the work that the American Volunteers are doing for prisoners.

ANDOVER churches are to unite in a series of meetings with the primary object of deepening the spiritual life. The Evangelistic Association of New England will co-operate. The meetings commence Nov. 29, and continue for a week. Among the prominent speakers will be Rev. Drs. Smith Baker, A. H. Plumb, L. B. Bates.——South. After being closed three months for repairs, the renovated vestries, brightened and modernized at an outlay of $4,000, were reopened last Sunday. The people had responded so liberally that a larger sum was raised than was required. Four hundred dollars were contributed by the ladies of the Chapel Church, under whose auspices an Andover magazine was published and sold. Among its contributors were Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward, Octave Thanet, Annie Sawyer Downs and Laura S. Watson, and from the mechanical and literary points of view the publication reflected great credit upon its editors. All the services Sunday had relation to the improvement in equipment. The pastor, Rev. F. R. Shipman, preached on the Pauline conception of the church. The rally of the Sunday school was addressed by Rev. H. A. Bridgman, and in the evening neighboring pastors presented their congratulations.

LOWELL.—Highland. A special meeting of the C. E Society is held each month for the discussion of current events under the charge of the good citizenship committee.

DRACUT.—Center. "The Yellow Meeting House," erected in 1795, is to be remodeled and adapted to modern uses. The town has been notified that the church building is no longer to be used as a town house, and the election of the present month will close the series which began at the election of John Adams in 1796. The First or "Hillside" Church has invited the congregation to use its building during the repairs. "Hillside" is being greatly prospered under the leadership of Rev. E. L. Baker, whose Sunday evening services on Christ's Universals have interested large congregations for a country town.

NEW BEDFORD.—The Old Colony Association of ministers adopted a minute relative to the death of Rev. A. H. Quint, D. D., a member of the association. An expression of great sorrow was recorded and of appreciation of a character notable for its many excellencies, and of a life into which entered large measures of the highest usefulness.

WORCESTER.—Hope. Rev. H. W. Pope has assisted in a week and a half of evangelistic meetings. A deep spiritual life is evident, the membership is revived, and a large number of persons have begun the Christian life, especially young men.—— A complete victory over the indecent theater was scored recently through a move initiated by the good citizenship committee of Pilgrim Church C. E. Society in conjunction with the Y. M. C. A. The more than usual glaring posters of the most questionable theater in the city aroused the president and secretary of the Y. M. C. A. to secure needed evidence, and the following day they procured warrants for the arrest of the manager and company. In the court the evidence was so complete that no defense was attempted, and the manager was fined $100. The members of the company had their cases placed on file, and the chief of police, advised by the mayor, withdrew the company's permit to give a show in the city. Later the owner and manager of the theater waited upon the Y. M. C. A. people to see what they would be allowed to do, and were told plainly to stop their indecent performances and show bills. Absolute reforms were promised, and a great improvement is seen upon the bill board.

Maine.

RAYMOND.—Rev. E. M. Cousins of Gray closes his six months' engagement for afternoon services with the present month. Although there are attractive union chapels at the two points supplied, this is the first regular supply for both of them that has ever been obtained for so long a time. There is no church organization, but good congregations have gathered regularly.

DENMARK.—The pastor and family are now settled in a cozy parsonage. A hearty reception has just been tendered them and many good things were left. The first year of regular pastoral service closes hopefully. Fourteen persons have been received into the church, all obligations have been met and new lines of Christian activity entered upon.

BIDDEFORD.—Second. The attendance at church services is large and the religious work is active. The S. S. roll is increasing. The funds of the Ladies' Missionary Society are larger than ever before, and the treasury of the church is well supplied.

SOUTH PORTLAND.—Bethany. The prospect is good that the $1,500 recommended by the Cumberland Conference for the church building will be raised at once. Work is going rapidly forward and the vestry will soon be ready for use.

RUMFORD.—A legacy of $1,000 has been made to the church by the will of Miss Juliet Kimball of Boston, a native of this place.

New Hampshire.

MERIDEN will take advantage of the return of confidence to ask its friends to assist in raising the $1,350 still lacking in the building fund. Many delays have occurred and the two-year sojourn in Kimball Union Academy Chapel proves discouraging. Yet the attendance is now more encouraging than for a long time in the past and the church is united and earnest.——Colonel and Mrs. Charles Colby celebrated their golden wedding Nov. 16. About 100 friends were present.

BROOKLINE.—This church spread a sumptuous banquet for the men of the community on the evening of Nov. 17. About 50 men were present and it is hoped that its influence will be such as to draw in men who could not otherwise have been reached. The pastor, Rev. J. A. Belanger, has just completed a series of Sunday evening addresses on The Divinity of Christ. Under the present pastorate there have been additions to the church at every communion but one.

MANCHESTER.—South Main gave a reception to the new pastor, Rev. C. A. Bidwell, Nov. 17, at which nearly 300 were present during the evening to extend cordial greetings and good wishes for the success of the pastorate so auspiciously begun. Several of the clergymen of the city offered welcome and fellowship.

ATKINSON.—A contract has been made for a new chapel, to be 26 x 38 feet, adjoining the church and opening into it by folding doors. It will contain on the lower floor an audience-room; ladies' parlor and hallway, and on the upper a room for church entertainments and a storeroom. It will greatly improve the external appointments of the church and add much to its conveniences.

WARNER.—The pastor, Rev. A. H. Armes, has the sympathy of the entire community in the loss of his wife. Although Mrs. Armes had been here less than a year and in poor health, she had endeared herself to all who had made her acquaintance. An educated, consecrated woman, her influence would have been marked in the parish if her life had been spared.

JAFFREY has just completed extensive repairs, and had a rededication with interesting and appropriate exercises Nov. 16. The sudden and severe illness of the pastor, Rev. W. W. Livingston, was a shadow on the occasion. It is hoped a few weeks' vacation will fully restore him to health and usefulness.

PETERBORO has held union revival services which continued for ten weeks under the lead of Rev. E. P. Hammond. As a result more than 50 young people and children profess to have begun the Christian life.

Vermont.

Over $200 have been expended recently in slating the roof and tinning the spire of the church edifice in Hinesburgh.——Through the efforts of the Ladies' Aid Society in Franklin the parsonage has received new blinds and a coat of paint.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Pilgrim. To increase attendance on the church service by the Sunday school, tickets have been given to the members, to be signed and deposited in the contribution baskets. The Men's Club has appointed a committee to confer with neighboring pastors and church clubs of all denominations as to some way of regular and continued visitation upon the non-church going people of that section of the city.

BRISTOL.—The pastorate which Rev. H. A. Stevens has held fifteen years was terminated Nov. 10. The council acted reluctantly and with regret because of the removal from this community of one who has faithfully served in so many of its interests. Mr. Stevens was recently presented with a gift of money from his many friends employed at the factory of the National India Rubber Company and with a fine Mackintosh coat.

It is probable that the Congregational Work will go into every family of the Barrington church.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—The Ministers' Meeting Monday mornings is discussing the status of missionary work under the different denominations.——The fall meeting of the auxiliary of the McAll Association was held in United Church Chapel Nov. 16, and was addressed by Miss Alletta Lent.——United. The opening address of the Men's Club Sunday evening course was given Nov. 22, by Dr T. T. Munger, on The Supreme Principle of Society. The adult Bible class is taught by Prof. B. W. Bacon of Yale.

NEW LONDON.—Second. Surveys were made lately about the parsonage preparatory to building a new one at once. It was the purpose of the late J. N. Harris to build the parsonage, and his plans were so well under way that Mrs. Harris esteems it a duty and a privilege to carry out his wishes. The old structure will be removed.

NEW BRITAIN.—First. Vesper services are becoming popular.——South has voted to continue the free pew system.——Swedish, Bethany. Rev. E. G. Hjerpe, the pastor, has received a call to a Swedish church in Providence and to one in Brockton, Mass. He has been pastor for eight years.

KENSINGTON.—The members of the church subscribed generously towards the church debt of $500 last Sunday, which they are determined shall be paid off during the ensuing year.

NEWINGTON.—At the annual meeting of the ecclesiastical society, it was voted to sell no seat less than the appraisal, this action being taken in order to raise more money.

STONINGTON.—Second. Mrs. N. G. Smith has given to this church, Rev. C. J. Hill, pastor, the sum of $1,000, the interest of which is to be devoted to the current expenses.

Through the generosity of Hon. William Sumner, the meeting house in Tolland is receiving a new coat of paint.——The Litchfield parsonage has been put into excellent condition by recent renovations.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

SINCLAIRVILLE.—Rev. J. H. Elliott conducted a series of union evangelistic services last September. The time was somewhat unfavorable, but a good degree of interest was awakened. The churches were refreshed and a fair number signed cards. At the last communion nine new members were added. The church is enjoying an unusual degree of prosperity. Within the last 13 months there have been 45 additions, all but two on confession. This increase more than doubles the effective strength. Rev. B. N. Wyman is pastor.

OGDENSBURG.—First. The work progresses well in all departments. The social element has been emphasized by a series of receptions, to which a large number outside the regular congregation were invited. The music has been improved by the addition of an orchestra. The loss sustained in the death of Deacon David Stephens is keenly felt. He was active in all departments. Rev. C. W. Wilson is pastor.

SUMMER HILL.—Rev. Lemuel Jones of the H. M. S. has been holding evangelistic services with Rev. A. M. Asadoorian for two weeks with marked success. About 16 persons joined the church Nov. 8. Mr. Jones is now laboring with Rev. J. H. Barnett at Lakewood.

CORONA.—Union. A number have been recently added to the church. Cottage prayer meetings from two to five a week have been held in various parts of the parish as a continuation of the September revival services.

NORWICH.—Rev. E. J. Klock and his wife have taken up their abode in a pleasant new house. Mr. Klock entered upon his service as pastor Nov. 8.

Miss A. M. Kyle of Boston has visited a dozen or more of the churches of the Black River and St. Lawrence Association, arousing interest in the women's work connected with the A. B. C. F. M.

New Jersey.

NEWARK.—Bethlehem. Four persons were recently received to membership. A small church building has been secured on which $1,100 have been paid. It is hoped that the remaining $2,400 may be paid the coming year, after which it is planned to enlarge and improve the structure. The Y. P. S. C. E. is flourishing, and a Lincoln Lyceum,

THE INTERIOR.

Illinois.

OAK PARK.—First has solved the Sunday evening problem by the Men's Club. Sunday evening, Nov. 1, by actual count 1,020 persons were present, and Nov. 8, 1,300. The "welcome" wins the people, not only in words on the handbill, freely circulated, and which contains the order of service, but from the members of the church who are present to grasp the hands of strangers and give them as good seats as at the time of their entrance into the sanctuary can be found. The pastor is Dr. P. S. Hulbert.

MARSEILLES.—First received 10 persons to fellowship, eight on confession, in November. The annual reports show a good condition both financially and spiritually. A bright outlook is seen for the growth of the church. The new pastor is Rev. C. M. Clark. The present resident membership is 268.

Indiana.

GAS CITY.—Mr. Matthew Hussey, the Welsh Congregational laborer, has succeeded in three months in establishing a vigorous congregation, a S. S. enrollment of 100 and cottage prayer meetings. Believers of various faiths are being united, and a subscription is under way to build a house.

PORTLAND.—Rev. M. W. Diggs, for many years pastor at Fort Recovery, is occasionally supplying this vacant church. He brings to his pulpit to a remarkable degree for a man of his years the strength of manhood, and his character and life give weight to his ministrations.

Michigan.

LANSING.—Pilgrim has had a steady development under the leadership of Rev. E. B. Allen. At the November communion 15 new members were received, nine on confession. A special service was arranged and carried through with great satisfaction.

OXFORD.—Renewed attempts are being made to yoke this with the Orion church again under one pastorate, a relationship existing at one time. The houses of worship are less than three miles apart and the churches have many things in common.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—Reber Place. The pastor, together with Rev. William Johnson of the Tabernacle Church, has been carrying on special services with good results for the two weeks beginning Nov. 8. —Hyde Park is one of the three churches in north St. Louis chosen by the joint committee of the pastors and the C. E. Union for the first of the series of revival services to be held in this city during the fall and winter. The meetings began Nov. 8. For the first week they were conducted by Rev. Dr. Fullerton, pastor of a Presbyterian church. The second week Rev. J. P. O'Brien of Hope Church occupied the pulpit. The Lord has blessed the work and it is thought that upwards of 40 souls have been converted. —Redeemer has been another center of union evangelistic work. Here, for the week beginning Nov. 8, Rev. J. H. Brookes, D.D., has had charge of the meetings. The second week the pulpit has been occupied by different pastors. The presence of the Spirit has been manifested and it is believed that a good number have given their hearts to Christ.

Iowa.

HAMPTON.—Rev. J. W. Ferner has closed his third year as pastor. The membership has increased from 139 to over 200. A Junior C. E. has been organized, a church manual published, $800 have been expended on the parsonage, and now a church building, to cost about $14,000, is well under way.

AMES.—During the six years' pastorate of Rev. F. J. Douglass, recently closed, the membership increased from 120 to 164. Of the 106 received, 41 came on confession. Thirteen were removed by death and none by discipline. The home expenditures during this pastorate were $6,481 and the benevolences $2,255.

Minnesota.

WALKER.—The new meeting house, costing about $1,000, built chiefly by outside gifts, was dedicated Nov. 20, Rev. J. H. Morley preaching the sermon. Evangelist C. B. Fellows has ministered acceptably for four months, and the erection of this building has been largely due to his efforts. No other English speaking church is within 40 miles. The women of the State are raising money to assist this enterprise through the C. C. B. S., and an appeal has been made to the Sunday schools to raise money to support the pastor. Both calls meet with encouraging response.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Fremont Avenue. Rev. James McAllister preached his closing sermon Nov. 15 to a large congregation. About 100 of his people attended him and his wife to the depot on their departure. The evangelistic band has held meetings with this church with good results.—Oak Park. Supt. S. V. S. Fisher is supplying for a few Sundays.

ORTONVILLE has repaired its parsonage and paid some old debts. It has a C. E. Society that helps in raising the salary of the pastor and in H. M. work. The pastor, Rev. G. W. Shaw, has opened work at Odessa, a destitute community.

South Dakota.

HETLAND AND BADGER.—This field is in a hopeful condition. A Junior C. E. Society of 20 members was recently organized at Hetland. The pastor, Rev. D. E. Armitage, preaches at Spring Lake once in two weeks.

Fact is worth a column of rhetoric. It is a fact established by the testimony of thousands, that Hood's Sarsaparilla does cure scrofula, salt rheum, catarrh, and other diseases and affections arising from impure state or low condition of the blood. It also overcomes that tired-feeling, creates a good appetite, and gives strength.

Catarrh and Dyspepsia.

"We have used Hood's Sarsaparilla in our family for years, and are never without it. My sister has been cured of catarrh and dyspepsia by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, and we have found it very valuable as a family medicine."—W. E. GOSELINE, 30 Orient Avenue, Brooklyn N. Y.

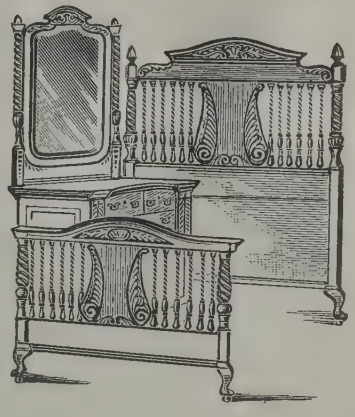
LOOKING AHEAD.

It is a good plan occasionally to look over the fence that surrounds you and see what is going on in the world. It sharpens your wits and broadens your opinions.

Here is a glimpse of what the leading furniture designers are doing. This is the direction toward which we are moving for the coming year, 1897. It is a radical departure and will make a new element of beauty in many houses.



No solid head-board was ever devised that could compete in effectiveness with an open work design of this nature. The spindle section is very deep, with the spiral fluted corner posts reproduced in miniature.

The whole set is very close to luxury. Made of old Spanish mahogany, with an inside finish of bird's-eye maple, and adorned with massive brass trimmings, it makes a fine appearance in any apartment.

The carving is finished in the natural wood, which is a trifle lighter than the antique and the effect is charming.

HONOR.

It was a grand trait of the old Roman that with him one and the same word meant honor and honesty. On the basis of honor and honesty every "Bay State" Mandolin, Guitar, Banjo, Zither and Flute is built. Honesty of workmanship, beauty of design, and absolute purity of tone, have made them the leading instruments of the world. But above all, there is honesty in price. This is their great distinction. REMEMBRANCE OF DR. H. E. PARKER.

A large congregation gathered Sunday evening, Nov. 15, in the South Church, Concord, for a memorial service to the late Rev. Dr. Henry E. Parker, pastor 1851-66, and subsequently professor of Latin at Dartmouth. The present pastor, Rev. H. P. Dewey, conducted the service and addresses were given by speakers from the parish and city who had intimate acquaintance with Dr. Parker. Among those who bore testimony to his life and character Rev. F. D. Ayer, D. D., referred to the effect of his labors in the parish and community and Hon. J. B. Walker spoke of his efficiency in promoting the educational interests of the city. Soon after the firing upon Sumter, Dr. Parker, who was a consistent patriot, sought leave of absence and went to war as chaplain of the Second New Hampshire. Col. Hiram Gerish, representing surviving members of the regiment, who were present in a body, spoke of the valor of the parson soldier, which, together with his abounding sympathy, won the respect and love of all the men. The warm affection felt for him by the students of the college in which he taught for a quarter of a century was the theme of the concluding addresses by Gen. F. L. Streeter, class of '74, and Mr. G. H. Moses, class of '90.

A NOVEL DESIGN.—Have you seen the new openwork bedsteads which are coming into fashion this fall? They are very interesting and well worth a close examination. They have some beautiful patterns of these openwork bedsteads at the warerooms of the Paine Furniture Co. on Canal Street. They are charmingly artistic and very moderate in cost, as befits a new fashion of the present year.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

There is no boom; indeed, it is not the time of year for one, but there is a moderate business doing and it is improving every day. The holiday trade is expected to be larger this year than for several seasons past, and merchants are making their preparations accordingly. The note brokers certainly report an increase in the supply of business paper, which is ascribed to the approaching holiday season. But in speaking of the general situation, the most noteworthy feature, probably, is the grand spirit of hope and confidence with which the future is viewed. No more fear, no more hoarding, but every one trying to make a dollar earn another one.

In some lines manufacturers expect some spring business as early as next month. In printed fabrics, for instance, orders are expected in a small way before Christmas. It is figured that the country is not heavily or even ordinarily supplied with such goods, and that the demand will begin early. In fact all manufacturers are looking forward to the immediate future with more hope than for years. The iron and steel industry is recovering and, although still below normal, will soon attain the activity which characterizes prosperous times.

In general merchandise what is needed is good cold weather. The best call so far has been for dry goods and boots and shoes. The jobbing trade is particularly good, showing an increase over the previous week. Prices of staples are firm in most instances. The very slightly easier tendency of print cloths at Fall River has been overemphasized; the reaction in raw cotton was responsible for it. Wool remains very firm in price and holders are believers in higher prices. In mentioning the demand for boots and shoes it was forgotten to allude to the obstructive influence which the advance in hides and leather has upon new orders for shoes.

A very favorable feature was the increase in bank clearings for the whole country last week, aggregating $1,236,000,000, which was nearly 4 per cent. more than the large total of the previous week, nearly 10 per cent. more than for the same week last year and 21 per cent. more than for the third week of November, 1894. The heavy exports of wheat and corn continue, and indeed the foreign trade of the country is in most excellent condition, a large balance being in our favor.

BIBLE STUDY AT NEW HAVEN.

This educational center is coming more and more to be a place for conventions and conferences. A Conference for Bible Study and the Deepening of the Spiritual Life met Nov. 17-20. Meditation services were held each day conducted by 12 different clergymen. The Bible classes were conducted by such leaders as Rev. Walter Rauschenbusch of New York, Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, Rev. Leighton Williams, Rev. E. C. Sage and Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin. Missions were discussed by Rev. Messrs. H. C. Mabie, F. M. Ellis, A. C. Dixon, W. L. Phillips, H. L. Morehouse and Col. S. H. Hadley. One of the most stirring addresses was by Dr. Josiah Strong on The Christianization of Money. The singing was under the direction of L. B. Greenwood.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

LEWISTON.—Rev. H. H. Cole of Weaverville, assisted by Missionary Kidd and Sec. H. H. Wikoff, dedicated a new meeting house Nov. 1, the first one built by the Congregationalists in Trinity County. When Mr. Cole is absent at the out posts the pulpit is supplied by his wife, whose service is cordially received by the people.

SAN JOSE.—In spite of financial pressure there was great cause for rejoicing at the annual meeting. Rev. H. M. Tenney has served acceptably five years and a half. In this time 95 persons united on confession, 204 in all. The benevolences have increased from $80 to $574.

OAKLAND.—The several churches united in a "Martin Luther memorial service" held with the First Congregational Church. Rev. Dr. Wendta (Unitarian) exhibited choice stereopticon views illustrating the subject.

BAKERSFIELD.—Rev. J. W. Philips is making a strong fight against the 60 or more saloons. Other centers of iniquity are also feeling the influence of his work.

Washington.

VANCOUVER, Rev. T. W. Butler, pastor, has now a house of its own, and in addition has rented a corner store in a central part of the city, repaired, decorated and furnished the interior. Its evening congregations are larger than ever.

CATHLAMET has secured the gift of a finely situated site for its new house of worship and already has it inclosed. This is the first church building erected by Protestants in a town more than 40 years old. Rev. C. W. Wells is pastor.

LONG BEACH.—The pastor, Rev. H. W. Mercer, preaches once a month at Chinook, about seven miles distant. Several members of his church reside there, and are employed in salmon fishing.

NORTH YAKIMA, after many hindrances, has secured a deed to a site in a central part of the town and will begin building at once.

THE CONNECTICUT CONFERENCE.

The ride from Hartford to Winsted over the picturesque P. R. & N. E. Railroad is most delightful, carrying one through the valleys and over the lofty hills of western Connecticut, in the wildest and most scenic portion of the State. Although containing less than 10,000 inhabitants, Winsted is more than three miles in length, lying in a serpentine-like valley around the base of a mountain. The railroad makes three stops within its limits, but guides at all the stations settled the confusion of the delegates as to where to alight. The welcome extended by Rev. G. F. Prentiss and his people was most cordial.

The feature of the meeting, though of course totally unexpected, was the attack upon the financial administration of the American Missionary Association, and the reply by Secretary Beard. It was during the business session Tuesday afternoon that the matter was brought up by two New Haven clergymen who placed a motion before the conference, asking that a committee of investigation be appointed. A spirited discussion ensued during which numerous motions variously disposing of the affair were made and put to vote. All were lost but one laying the whole matter on the table. But this was immediately afterwards taken from the table and subjected to further debate. A motion was finally passed that a committee of three be appointed by the nominating committee to investigate the charges made by Brothers Mutch and Phillips, and confer with the visiting secretary tomorrow, and if possible report to this conference before its adjournment.

Wednesday morning Rev. Dr. A. F. Beard, field secretary of the A. M. A., spoke in answer to the charges. He had been waited upon by the committee, Rev. W. T. Mutch, Dr. Frank Russell and Dr. S. L. Blake, and was prepared, although he had had but a few hours' notice, to make his reply, laying aside the address on the work of the A. M. A. which he had intended to give. Dr. Beard slowly and impressively read his answer from a notebook, clearly vindicating along every point the allegations made. He was listened to with intense interest and growing favor. He showed how the reports started, rising through a difference in judgment between the executive committee and one who had been formerly in the service. Two years ago the whole question of financial administration was thoroughly examined by Colonel Fairbanks of Vermont and Hon. A. L. Williston of Massachusetts, and their report, which was printed, commended in the highest terms the economy of the administration. This year that duty was repeated by a special committee of examination, men of the highest standing in the business world as well as in the church, and their report, which is shortly forthcoming, says substantially all that Colonel Fairbanks did.

In reply to the differences said to exist between the workers and the home office, he said that the society was never more harmonious, happy and hopeful, and showed that this must be so as the work was increased last year, although the expenditures were cut $75,000. He invited investigation. Many had made it and there were none that had not been satisfied, and thoroughly so.

A hearty round of applause followed his address and a general expression of opinion was made that was most cordial towards the association, showing that its judgment and sympathies had been in no way injured, but if anything strengthened. A motion that the confidence of the conference in the A. M. A. in its financial administration and field work was unabated was then passed by a hearty unanimous vote.

Another action that caused considerable debate before it was taken was the adopting of a recommendation to request the National Council at its next meeting to consider whether any reduction can wisely be made in their expenses.

The suggestion that the Connecticut reports and statistics which have become so noted for their fund of invaluable information be abridged and the several reports be presented by themselves met with much disfavor, and the efficient secretary and registrar, Rev. W. H. Moore, re-elected for the fortieth consecutive time by a unanimous vote, was instructed to issue them as usual to the number of 1,500. An assessment of four and a half cents per church member to defray the expenses of the conference was voted. The invitation of Rev. Dr. Frank Russell to meet in the South Church at Bridgeport next year was accepted.

The sermon was preached by Rev. S. H. Howe. The subjects of addresses and papers were: The Church and the Kingdom of God, by Prof. G. B. Stevens; Education for the Ministry, Prof. A. L. Gillett; Ought Our National Benevolent Societies to Hold Their Annual Meetings Together? Hon. G. M. Carrington; Pastoral Care, Fraternal Fellowship and The Evangelistic Spirit in the Local Church, by Rev. Messrs. C. A. Northrop, Joseph Anderson, D. D., and T. M. Miles. Rev. Messrs. G. A. Hood and William Kincaid represented their respective societies, the C. C. B. S. and the C. H. M. S. E. D. C.

THE FIRST CHURCH COUNCIL, LOWELL, MASS.

The long-desired council to investigate the troubles in this church met Nov. 18. Principal Bancroft of Andover was chosen moderator. Of the twenty-six churches of the conference all but one were represented, but Kirk Street sent a communication doubting the wisdom of a council and offering to meet with the estranged brethren for prayer but not for discussion, and the pastor and delegate withdrew from the council. Trinity Church, Lawrence, had voted to be represented with the distinct understanding that in accepting the invitation it did not thereby commit itself to a recognition of the claims of those calling the council. The council voted, twenty-five to ten, that in organizing under the letter missive they did not consider themselves as recognizing in advance of evidence the claims of the party calling the council, which claims they were present to investigate. Besides the churches represented, Rev. Drs. Webb and Plumb were members of the council. In answer to questions it was stated that no attempt to secure the co-operation of the First Trinitarian people in calling the council had been made, but they had been notified of the call and had been requested to send any evidence or testimony which they might desire to present.

Two sessions of three hours each were spent in listening to the statements made by those who worship in the church building, with the protests against their course from those who were worshiping in the neighboring hall, and in hearing the church records of the past ten months. The claims of the party in possession of the meeting house were summed up under four points: 1. That Mr. Kenngott's pastorate terminated Dec. 31, 1895. 2. That all reasonable efforts had been made to settle the trouble by council or arbitration. 3. The church as an ecclesiastical body has never voted to become incorporated or to change its name. 4. Neither the church nor any part of it has been ousted from its original place of worship. Among the important documents submitted was the legal opinion of Mr. T. H. Russell, counsel for the parties calling the council, that the law authorizing churches to become incorporated was unconstitutional. The council adjourned for two weeks, at which time it will hear the claims of those who worship at the hall where Mr. Kenngott is the preacher. G. H. J.

THE ALABAMA CONVENTION.

The fourth session was held at Shelby, Nov. 11, 12. Two points of the meeting are of general interest to Congregationalists. The committee on education, acting under instructions given last year, reported a course of study for candidates for the ministry who have not enjoyed the advantages of collegiate or theological training. The course was accepted and recommended for adoption by the district conferences. It includes works by authors of the highest repute on intellectual philosophy, ethics, systematic theology, Congregational history and polity, general church history, the life of Christ, the theory of preaching and pastoral theology. Owing to financial depression no progress toward founding an educational institution of high grade in this State has been made this year. But a movement in which Superintendent Bassett was prominent has been going forward in association with the State Normal College at Troy, whose president visited New York last spring and secured the hearty indorsement of the plans by our national H. M. S. secretaries. The board of college management has also given its indorsement and approved the appointment of Rev. A. T. Clarke as dean of the Congregational Training School and supervisor of theological studies for all students in the college who may wish to take up studies in that line. The present plan for students is study at home under the direction of the dean with a month's attendance at the college in June.

Another point of general interest is the action of the convention on ecclesiastical relations. The present attitude of the convention is what it was two years ago. It was then generally felt that the ecclesiastical relations had been happily adjusted. A year later the association was divided on the "union question"; and inasmuch as at that time but one church in ten in Alabama had recorded a vote against the convention, and no action was taken by the association this year, the convention invites the association and the churches connected with it to reconsider the overtures for union in this body. The work of our national benevolent societies was considered and addresses delivered, and ringing resolutions adopted on temperance and other timely topics. A. T. C.

CONSTANTINOPLE. THE GALATA BRIDGE
Where many Armenians were recently butchered. From Article on "AN EYE-WITNESS TO ARMENIAN MASSACRES."

A NOVEL BY RICHARD HARDING DAVIS

The hero of "Soldiers of Fortune" is a young American engineer who is sent to a small South American Republic to superintend the mines of an American company. The rich American owner of the mines and his two daughters are brought into the action, and there is a love tale running through the whole romance. There is not a slow page, and the scenes will be illustrated throughout by C. D. Gibson, the author's friend.

THE UNQUIET SEX

Each sex is likely to think the other the unquiet one. The author in these bright articles, Mrs. Helen Watterson Moody, will write on "WOMAN AND REFORMS," "THE COLLEGE-BRED WOMAN," "WOMAN'S CLUBS" and "THE CASE OF MARIA," a paper on domestic service.

A NEW DECADE OF SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

The features of the coming twelvemonth, which have been two years in preparation, offer in every way a better programme than it has ever been the good fortune of this magazine to promise its readers.

LONDON AS SEEN BY C. D. GIBSON

The artist here will, for the first time, appear as a writer. He has written and illustrated six articles giving the results of his visit to London last summer for SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE. The illustrations are the best Mr. Gibson has yet done, and present portraits of the most striking figures in London life.

SHORT STORIES BY GEORGE W. CABLE

Beyond the fiction before enumerated comes a series of four short stories by Mr. Cable, the only ones he has written for many years past, and prepared exclusively for the Magazine.

THE CONDUCT OF GREAT BUSINESSES

To the average American his business occupation is one of absorbing interest. He wants to know how other business men manage their affairs and push great enterprises to success. No separate establishments will be described, but the authors have made diligent study of the most successful firms in each branch, and have gone to the fountain head of information. The illustrations have been secured with the utmost care and represent the actual scenes. This year in SCRIBNER'S the American people will see itself at work.

JAPAN AND CHINA SINCE THE WAR

The interest in Li Hung Chang's visit, and the rumor that American capital is going into Oriental cotton mills, shows how general is the wish to know about them as they are today. Mr. Stephen Bonsal, an experienced traveler and writer, was commissioned by the Magazine to look into Japanese industrial conditions, to learn in what direction China has been affected by the war, to describe the changes going on.

PICTURES OF OUT-OF-DOOR LIFE BY A. B. FROST

At appropriate seasons through the year Mr. Frost will furnish groups of characteristic drawings. The advent of Spring will be signalized by some Fishing Pictures in a new vein; in the Fall a set of Hunting Pictures will appear, also Golf and Christmas Pictures at appropriate seasons.

THE ART OF TRAVEL

A well-illustrated series will give suggestions and data on "OCEAN AND LAND TRAVEL," by Lewis Morris Iddings; Mr. Richard Harding Davis will also write on "TRAVELERS ONE MEETS; THEIR WAYS AND METHODS." The illustrations, by American and foreign artists, will be highly pertinent.

THE STORY OF A PLAY BY W. D. HOWELLS

Mr. Howells is never so thoroughly charming as when he is in his delightful vein of light comedy. He gives us now his best novelette produced in this vein. It sparkles from first to last with amusing situations and dialogues that are full of sentiment.

AN EYE-WITNESS TO ARMENIAN MASSACRES

The Magazine has been fortunate in securing a truthful narrative, by a writer for whose authority it can vouch, of the recent Constantinople massacres. For the first time is published an eye-witness's account, absolutely trustworthy, of one of the most horrible events in human history. The article will appear in the January issue.

THE YEAR'S FRONTISPIECES

Beginning in January the frontispieces will present leading scenes in the world's greatest novels, so that the result will be a series of the finest imaginative drawings. Each scene has been undertaken by an artist in sympathy with it. Among the artists will be: ABBEY, VIERGE, PYLE, RAVEN-HILL, FROST, HATHERELL, VAN SCHAICK, GIBSON, HOLF, CASTAIGNE, VOLK.

LIFE IN AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES

These articles are not cut-and-dried accounts of the colleges as institutions, but tell how undergraduates have lived and how they live now. College men will pleasurably anticipate these articles from the names of their authors: Judge Henry E. Howland writing on "UNDERGRADUATE LIFE AT YALE," Mr. James W. Alexander on "PRINCETON," and Robert Grant and Edward S. Martin on "HARVARD." The artists of the Magazine who will illustrate the articles have lived for some time in close contact with the student life at each college, making sketches and studies of actual rooms and scenes.

It is impossible in a small space to even mention the many attractive features for 1897. A beautiful illustrated booklet has been prepared, which will be sent, postage paid, on request.

Thus, with a new font of type, improved mechanical facilities and plans, interesting a wider range of readers, begins the new decade for Scribner's Magazine.

Longmans, Green, & Co.'s Selected List

OF IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS.

H. RIDER HAGGARD'S NEW STORY.

THE WIZARD.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD, author of "She," "King Solomon's Mines," "Joan Haste," etc. With 19 full page illustrations by Charles Kerr. Crown 8vo, cloth, ornamental, $1 25.

Mr. Rider Haggard's new story has a motive which is believed to be new to recent fiction. The tale is African, and deals with the conversion of a savage tribe by a missionary and martyr, who does not trust to the ordinary resources of proselytism, but takes his stand upon a literal interpretation of the New Testament promises. The story tells how his faith triumphed and how it was strangely supported and justified by a superior Power working through the forces of nature and granting a direct aid which so many deny in these latter days to be vouchsafed to man. The keynote of the book is that Faith can, and still does, work miracles.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A TRUTH.

By EDNA LYALL, author of "Doreen," "Donovan," "The Autobiography of a Slander," etc. 12mo, paper, 30 cents.

"This little story, told with the force of a practical writer, may do more to bring home to popular apprehension the horrible cruelty with which the Armenians are being treated than acres of newspaper writing and reams of official reports. . . . We most heartily commend it to our readers."—Pacific Churchman, San Francisco.

"Timbuctoo has always been mysterious, and is less known to English readers than the City of the Sun. This book, however, will enlighten him, for it traces the history of the city from the early ages of Egyption civilization up to the present day, and shows, with the aid of many beautiful illustrations, the rise and fall of the capital of Darkest Africa."

In it will be found, among other items of interest, accounts of the trial of Warren Hastings, the Apotheosis of Voltaire, and incidents of the French Revolution, described by an eye-witness. The letters also contain an account of the writer's personal intercourse with Comte de Lally Tollendal and other leading refugees. The volume is illustrated by numerous portraits.

IAN MACLAREN made his first visit to Boston last week and received as hearty a welcome as any man from over the ocean has had here for many years. Four times Tremont Temple was filled to hear him. Last Saturday night, notwithstanding a heavy rain, every seat was occupied in the great auditorium, and he could not have wished for a more responsive audience. His hearers evidently knew the characters he had created in the Bonnie Brier Bush and Auld Lang Syne, and they were delighted by the humor and moved by the pathos with which he reintroduced to them the children of his brain and heart. He said that he had been told that Boston was different from other cities, but the one difference he had most noted was that he had here found the most cordial reception given to him in America. The Old South Church would have been more than twice crowded by the people who came to hear him preach last Sunday morning, and those who were so fortunate as to get inside of the building had their expectations fully met. He has spoken to what is best in us and has had a response in kind. We esteem more highly and think more kindly of our fellowmen because he has been with us, and in helping us to greater love for men he has brought us nearer to God. A true minister of Jesus Christ is Rev. John Watson, D. D., and a rare interpreter of human life is Ian Maclaren. The two together make a noble man whom Boston has delighted to honor.

Among the elements which have combined to make the life of Dr. Storrs a life of intellectual and spiritual leadership, his well known lectures upon Preaching Without Notes, given before the students of Union Seminary in 1875 and afterwards gathered in a book, must not be overlooked. The lectures themselves were so apt an illustration of the theme which they considered and of the possibilities of the method which they advocated, and the pulpit practice of the speaker was so inspiring, that those who heard him were emboldened to rid themselves of the restraint of the manuscript and to venture upon the well-considered freedom to which the lecturer showed the way. If the book is not as stimulating as the lectures themselves proved to those who heard them, it has its own power of deliberate impression, and has been influential already with more than twenty classes of theological students in our seminaries. It has, indeed, been one of the efficient causes in that change of pulpit style which has made our church services more pleasing and effective. Nor would it be fair to hold the author responsible for the occasional misuse of the method by shallow brains. As he developed and illustrated it by his own experience it was no easy road to success, but rather the most effective method of applying studies which might be as laborious and far-reaching as the circumstances of the preacher would allow. The cautions of the book are as wise as its incentives to free speaking.

A judge died a few days ago whose duties as servant of the nation had compelled him to decree sentence of death upon no less than 160 desperate characters of the Southwest. We have recently called attention to the policeman and his virtues. It is equally necessary for society to bear in mind the temptations, burdens and sorrows of those whom it selects to dispense justice. Have you ever thought what it means for a sensitive, honorable judge to say to a man, however brutal or guilty, "Thou must die," or, "Thou must be imprisoned for life," even though the judge be simply the instrument recording the verdict of the jury, and society?

Among the 5,482 Congregational churches in the United States, 1,395 received no accessions last year on confession of faith. This statement has been oft repeated of late as an evidence that present methods of church work are inadequate and that other methods should be adopted. There is, no doubt, ground for argument in these figures, but it should be qualified by the fact that many of these churches live only in name; in several instances only one or two members remain, and a large number of these churches probably hold no meetings. For example, the Year-Book gives for Nebraska 191 churches, twenty eight of which have fifteen resident members or less. Washington has 118 churches, with thirty-six having not more than fifteen members each. California has 204 churches, forty-eight of which have an average of about seven and a half members each. It would be absurd to suggest that such churches might flourish if they would adopt institutional methods. Some of them no doubt could be brought to life through the labors of evangelists. Some of them have no reason to claim continued existence. But the facts suggest also that State organizations of churches ought to dispose of their dead bodies by taking them off their rolls. This suggestion applies no less to the records of other denominations than to Congregationalists.

Prof. George Adam Smith's speech at the opening of the Free Church Divinity College, Glasgow, Oct. 21, deserves attention for two reasons. First, because of its suggestions suitable for the consideration of those who are charged with the duty of administering theological schools out of Scotland as well as in it, and, second, because of its references to the divinity schools of this country. He believes that three great changes have made a reorganization of divinity school curricula imperative. To quote his own words:

First, the university curriculum has been reorganized; second, methods of teaching theology have altered; third, the increasing complexity of life has bred large developments in the practical work of the church. These changes suggest, if they do not enforce, on the one hand the reorganization and enlarged equipment of the scientific side of divinity school discipline, and, on the other, a courageous treatment of the question whether they should continue to force or attempt to force all candidates for the ministry through one and the same curriculum; whether they should not begin to inquire how far, if at all, the needs of the practical ministry would justify them in relieving some of their men from that study of the dead languages through which they dragged their willing but faint spirits.

Whither shall the Scotch Presbyterians turn for practical suggestions? "To the United States," answers Professor Smith.

While in Glasgow our rich men are not slow to give to the practical ministry, and churches and missions are subscribed for with rapidity, there is an ominous indifference to the needs of theological discipline which contrasts with the state of feeling which prevailed at the Reformation or even so recently as the foundation of the Free Church colleges in Scotland. In America this is not so. Wealthy Christians, both men and women, have been impressed by the increased need for an educated ministry, or they have been fascinated by the new fields of research opened up in Semitic or early Christian history, or in the comparative history of religions, and they have lavishly endowed not only new chairs, museums and libraries, but expeditions of research and exploration.

THE BIBLE AND ITS INTERPRETERS.

Several ministers in Brooklyn are preaching series of sermons on the Bible. From newspaper reports one would infer that they present sharp contrasts of opinion concerning its nature and authority. Dr. McConnell, an Episcopal clergyman, said that fifty years ago the belief was general in the universality of the flood, but "today it would be difficult to find any one who believes in it." Yet not far away that same day a Presbyterian minister was affirming his belief in every statement of the Bible as literal fact and declaring, "When faith in its divine inerrancy is abandoned there is no stopping place short of infidelity." Dr. Abbott said, "An infallible book is an impossible conception." Rev. G. H. Horne told his people, "Men must have an infallible book or die in darkness and despair." He mentioned Dr. Abbott and Prof. Henry Drummond by name, and charged them with misleading unstable souls by their delusions, hurling against them Paul's anathema, "Let him be accursed." Dr. Abbott says that Moses did not write the Pentateuch as we now have it, and that the Old Testament contains legends and epic poetry written as history. Dr. Fox declared that Christ said Moses wrote the Pentateuch and thus forever settled the question. Mr. Moody said: "As for a minister who does not believe in all of the Bible, I don't think he is worth a snap of my fingers. . . . I tell you, my friends, when you cut out the tale of Jonah you have got to cut out God." Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall is preaching a series of seven sermons on The Spiritual Use of the Bible, of which he says: "The glory and majesty of the Holy Scriptures are unveiled by the Holy Spirit to whomsoever will, with a reverent and docile mind, approach the oracles of God." In this statement all those whom we have quoted would agree. But their utterances illustrate apparently divergent views concerning the human element in the origin of the Bible held by prominent Christian teachers, which are widely spread before the people. They probably reflect much current popular discussion. It will be well for those who engage in it to bear certain facts in mind which we proceed to mention.

The questions at issue between these brethren are not of chief importance. Men are most concerned to know, not what means and men God used to give to mankind the revelation of himself, but what that revelation is. Its divine character and authority are attested, not by the men who wrote the Old Testament—many of the authors being unknown—but by its power over men's hearts and consciences, and its answers to their greatest needs. By those who seek God his voice is heard and recognized in the Holy Scriptures. They are made the most precious literature in the world, not through what we know of their history, but because they are able to make us "wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." No honest man who seeks from the Scriptures light on the way to God need fail to see it.

The Bible will stand the keenest scrutiny and will be the more valuable to the world because of it. Its worth above all other books is demonstrated in history in the supremacy of the nations which have received it as from God, and in the lives of the millions to whom it has spoken and is speaking with an authority which their consciences and faith recognize beyond question.

These preachers belong to evangelical denominations in fellowship with one another. All the beliefs they represent concerning the Bible are held by accredited teachers in each of their denominations. No one can be excluded for holding any of these views. It is, therefore, not wise for any of them to denounce in public those brethren from whom they differ.

All these ministers, presumably, seek the spiritual welfare of their congregations. They know that they can gain nothing by weakening the authority of the Bible over their hearers, or by claiming for it authority which cannot be maintained. In its pages they must find the substance of their message to men, and if they do not find it there they cannot claim to have been sent to preach the gospel. They have, therefore, it is fair to presume, one and the same motive in their treatment of the Bible—to lead their hearers to see Christ in it as the Son of God and to transform them into his likeness. When their opinions differ, we may not reject any of them because the characters and motives of the teachers are unworthy.

But whatever their views concerning the infallibility of the Bible, they do not claim that they themselves are infallible. They appeal, therefore, to the judgment of their hearers. They seek to inform and instruct them, but not to compel assent to what their reason rejects. Occasionally, perhaps, some of these teachers for a moment forget their mission, as when one of them said: "Can our reason determine what is true in the Bible and what is not true? If so, whose reason shall we follow?"—while he was demonstrating to the reason of his hearers that the whole Bible is true. But ministers, as a rule, urge men to follow the example of the noble Bereans, who "searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." Mr. Moody said, earnestly, "Get a Bible and read and study it. Then you will be able to judge for yourself." Most preachers do not insist on the adoption of their own views of the Bible, but they all plead with their hearers to study it for themselves.

It is easier to make assertions concerning the infallibility or the origin of the Bible than to prove them. But what are claimed to be the main results of recent Biblical criticism are now published in popular form so that the ordinary student of the Bible can judge whether or not they are true. No sensible person will accept or reject them without examination. And they so much affect the meaning of many things in the Bible that those who seek to know its message will welcome whatever new light is thrown on it by these researches.

These brethren with divergent views about the ways in which the Bible came to us, but with a common faith that it brings to us the supreme revelation of God's character and will, and a common purpose to be like him who is there revealed and to make others like him, are not as far apart as they seem. Some of the questions they are discussing, if not already settled, will be through the efforts of reverent scholarship, but never through contradiction and denunciation. Concerning those unsettled we all have the right of private judgment. Let us not permit our confidence in the truth to be shaken. Let us trust God, study his Word and show its power in our lives. We may not be able to settle fully the ways in which the Scriptures were composed, but "if any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching."

BACK FROM REALISM.

The presence of Rev. Dr. John Watson —Ian Maclaren—among us and the deserved popularity of his writings afford a pleasant reminder of the evident tendency in the reading world to turn back from the excessive realism which has had such favor of late to a certain idealism. We believe this to be a salutary tendency. The minute study and detailed, photographic portrayal of a subject are not to be wholly condemned, but their outcome has not always proved the most admirable. They tempt to the choice of subjects easiest to be thus handled, and these ordinarily are not the most inspiring. They tend also to exalt method above results, and method really is only a means, not the end itself.

Of course there is realism and realism. The lack of it, in the sense of failure to comprehend and portray the distinctive features of a scene or the special characteristics of an individual, is fatal to an author's success. To leave the impression of having written about something insufficiently understood dooms one's work. But we never actually notice all the small details of either a landscape or a character. The attempt to represent them therefore goes beyond the truth which we know and in a degree becomes unreal because of its very fidelity. The true realism depicts faithfully what we see, not what we have reason to believe we might discover by unusual examination. Moreover, no accuracy of portrayal can render a disagreeable subject inviting, but rather the reverse. Mr. Howells illustrates this sort of realism conspicuously, and Zola's work is an even more notable and far more objectionable example of it. It may be important to describe a dunghill or a profligate, but it is neither wholesome nor artistic to picture the offensiveness of either needlessly and exhaustively.

So there is idealism and idealism. Many of the earlier novelists—Scott, for instance —gave too loose reign to the fancy. Their descriptions were so largely imaginary that their modern readers are conscious of an inadequacy, if not of an inaccuracy, in the portraits which they drew. They exaggerated boldly. But the idealism of the best modern authors of their class, of whom Dr. Watson himself is a fine illustration, avoids this error successfully. It disregards excessive particularity as to items in order to secure it as to outlines, atmospheres and coloring. It suggests more often than it defines and details. It emphasizes the nobler rather than the baser qualities and aspects of humanity, dealing with even the shadows in its pictures in a large and free, instead of a petty, manner.

This is morally useful and the return to it is commendable. It is better to win admiration for ability to interpret and sympathize with underlying principles and essential traits than for skill in mechanical delineation of comparative trifles. It is better to take broad views of life than narrow ones. It is better to appeal to and inspire the higher nature than to look for approval to the lower. The attention which has been given to realism in literature doubtless has had valuable results, but the return towards an intelligent idealism is to be welcomed heartily.

THE BOOK OF THE PILGRIMAGE.

We give liberal space this week to comments upon more than a hundred books put forth by various publishing houses of the country and we think it equally fitting and profitable to our readers to call attention to a book which The Congregationalist itself is just issuing. It is not a mercantile venture but is designed to gather up and preserve in permanent and beautiful form the fruits of the pilgrimage of last summer, whose influence in strengthening religious and national ties between England and America has been widely recognized.

It will be seen by referring to the announcement in our advertising columns that the price of this book will be advanced on the day of publication, Dec. 9, from $2.25 to $3 00 (postpaid). Our readers who wish to avail themselves of the lower figure should send their subscription without delay. It has been suggested that every public library ought to have a copy of this important book. It should certainly find a place in church libraries. A loyal Congregationalist in every town and city and in every church should see to it that this record of an event of such international importance to his denomination is presented to the libraries in which he has a local interest. The book will be widely read if placed within reach of the public.

Aside from its denominational interest The Book of the Pilgrimage is a charming record of travel through southern England and Holland. The text is accompanied by more than 150 illustrations. The localities of pilgrim interest were photographed expressly for us by the well-known artist, Clifton Johnson, whose illustrated edition of Ian Maclaren's stories just published has attracted such wide attention. There are about seventy portraits in the volume, and a special feature is the interesting collection of facsimile autographs—more than 100 in number. Some of the pictures, from private collections, and reproduced by special permission, are of unique interest.

The title-page, frontispiece and finis are from designs by Ipsen, who also furnished the initial letter for each chapter. These initials are one of the most attractive features of the book. With each one is incorporated a characteristic sketch which has local significance and illustrative value. The volume is a sumptuous quarto, printed on enameled paper, with wide margins, uncut edges and is bound in white parchment paper. The edition is necessarily a limited one as the book is printed from type, hence the advance in price, announced some weeks since, and to take effect Dec. 9. The near approach of Forefathers' Day and of Christmas make the book particularly timely, both as a valuable addition to existing volumes touching our spiritual fathers and as a choice gift from friend to friend.

RELIGIOUS READING.

This includes not merely the Bible and strictly devotional books, but any literature which tends directly to enrich the spiritual life. It consists in large part of volumes of devout meditations, religious poetry and the biographies of persons eminent for saintly living. It often is said that the habit of religious reading is dying out, and undoubtedly many individuals, even among professed Christians, neglect it. But the very large sales of such publications afford strong evidence to the contrary.

There still is a vast demand for such reading and a deep interest in it. But its character has changed somewhat during the last half-century, especially in the department of biography. Many once popular volumes of this class now are never read because of their unnaturalness. It is recognized more than formerly that there must be genuine manliness or womanliness as truly as piety in any character if it is to exert a useful spiritual influence.

But it is well understood that religious reading promotes both self-knowledge and knowledge of God. It is an aid to holy reflection. It prompts to intelligent prayer. It opens the soul's eyes to the way of duty. It quickens and enlarges the whole spiritual nature. It encourages us by informing us of the victories of divine truth in the hearts of others and in the world at large.

The best books and journals for religious reading are not always those which deal exclusively with distinctively sacred subjects. We live in a world of manifold thought and action and the highest type of religion takes this into account. Those publications which look at Christianity in its actual relations with mankind, which aim to help living people to learn and do God's will in common life, are usually the most helpful as well as the most enjoyable. But once in a while some book of old-world pious meditation, some actually mediæval record of religious mental processes or efforts, is found inspiring. Whatever by actual use brings Christ close is good for the soul.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Thanksgiving Day, at Home and Abroad.

The exhortations from the pulpit on Thanksgiving Day were both jubilant and solemn. Gratitude for past blessings very properly was dominant, but warning against individual and corporate sins was given its proper share in the prophetic message. In too many cities and towns athletic sports challenged and won the absorbing devotion of the populace, and everywhere there was far less formal compliance with the spirit of the day than there used to be. But charity abounded, and the fortunate did much for the unfortunate, a sign perhaps of the era in which ethics has displaced metaphysics and altruism has to some extent supplanted devotion to and worship of a personal God. President Cleveland obeyed the spirit and letter of his own proclamation, and attended divine worship in a Presbyterian church.

Canada joined with us in celebrating on the same day, and in all the great European capitals our loyal citizens and official representatives sat down to elaborate dinners and listened to appropriate and inspiring speeches. Mr. Bayard, our ambassador to Great Britain, was the guest of Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle, the venerable ruler doubtless taking this graceful way of showing her thanksgiving with us at the peaceful settlement of Anglo-American disputes. The dinner in Paris was chiefly one of American university graduates, and was graced by the presence of eminent French and German scholars. Much was done to cement the ties between American students and French educational institutions.

The American Flag in Turkey.

Our Department of State apparently has begun to feel the lash of criticism, for it has put forth the following statement:

The State Department authorizes the statement that the assertion made by Dr. Cyrus Hamlin that American women in Haskeui fled from massacre, not finding protection under the American flag, is an entire mistake; that the flag was neither furled nor insulted at that point, and that not an American man, woman or child was at Haskeui during the massacre. Equally unfounded is the statement recently made in Chickering Hall by Dr. Grace Kimball that only the English flag is respected in Turkey. During the massacre at Constantinople she hurried by other flags and found protection under her own flag and the escort of the American Consul-General. She passed through the streets where men were being killed by mobs, and went safely under our flag up the Bosporus.

Through scenes of mob violence all over Turkey our flag and missionaries have been protected by Turkish troops. We have lost by incendiary fires but two places, both far in the interior—the value being much less than the claims of England, France and Italy for monks and priests killed, churches burned or houses pillaged, and for which no indemnity has been paid. Every peaceful American arrested or detained has been released on demand of the American minister.

The demonstrations of revolutionists in Turkey are now the chief danger so far as our missionaries are concerned, whose safety is not promoted by intemperate expressions of public opinion excited by appeals to sentiment regardless of facts.

To this Dr. Hamlin already has replied in a convincing way, and Miss Kimball doubtless also will. It is not a pleasant thing to say, but the State Department is forcing many citizens of this country into the position of disbelieving in its sympathy, its courage and the veracity of its representation at Constantinople. We unhesitatingly declare that as between the statements of American citizens long resident in Turkey, whose lives of self-sacrifice and nobility have won the admiration of all men of all nations, and the statements of Mr. Terrell, whose career in Constantinople has made us a laughing-stock and himself an object of contempt and pity, we accept the word of the missionaries. If Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Olney wish the unbiased opinion of a genuine American on their foreign policy, let them read Albert Shaw in the December Review of Reviews, who says: "The situation in the Turkish empire has demanded from our government the prompt and vigorous defense of American rights, and the protection of American interests. The appeal has been to dull ears if not to perverted sympathies."

NOTES.

President Cleveland, in selecting Princeton, N. J., as his permanent home, has chosen an environment which will prove congenial to one whose ancestors were Presbyterians.

The majority of the French Catholic clergy of Canada decline to accept the decision respecting Manitoba's schools as final, and the French Catholic members of the Laurier ministry are being denounced as traitors to the church.

Experiments made by Mr. Edison in Orange, and by others here in Boston, indicate that by the use of the X rays the blind are to be made to see; and physicists and anatomists are to be compelled to revise their theories as to the location of the sense of sight.

Senator Raines's attack on the New York Police Commissioners has proved to be a boomerang, giving them the opportunity to show that the loopholes in the law which Senator Raines drafted are responsible for most of the abuses that now exist.

The death of Coventry Patmore, the English poet, removes one who had much spiritual discernment and power of expression. He was more than "a laureate of the tea table," as The Athenæum once dubbed him. Benjamin Apthorp Gould, who died last week, was one of the most eminent of our astronomers.

The czar, since his return to Russia, is said to have startled officialdom by his assumption of authority and disregard of precedent. Reports from several European capitals indicate that Russia still lies athwart any plan for concerted action with reference to Turkey, even negativing France's latest plan for her financial rehabilitation.

General Weyler has returned to the army with which he is endeavoring to defeat Maceo, the rebel leader. Bourke Cochran and Charles A. Dana spoke at an indignation meeting in New York last week, at which the Administration was denounced for its failure to interfere with the Cuban war; and similar views are voiced in the December Review of Reviews.

It seems probable that the Dawes Commission may secure a settlement of the vexed problem of the future of the Indian Territory. Senator Dawes is now on the ground. A convention of the Five Tribes has met and decided that, under certain conditions, they will accept allotments and become citizens of the United States. Should the negotiations to follow be successful, Senator Dawes and his associates will have done a great service. He may yet be remembered with most gratitude for his service to his country at fourscore years and later.

New York State's superintendent of public instruction has just ruled that the Board of Education of West Troy has no right to lease rooms for a public school in a parochial school building, or to employ teachers, however competent, who wear the garb of a religious order. He says:

> By the nature of the lease, by the wearing of distinctive garb, by the emblem (a cross) surmounting the building, by the inscription over the doorway, by the practical result that only the children of one particular faith attend this school, the conclusion is irresistible that the State, to all external intents and purposes, is maintaining a sectarian school therein at public expense. It was clearly the intent of this amendment to the organic law that this practice should be prohibited.

IN BRIEF.

Every one will rejoice in the deepening interest in the Fund for the Armenian Orphans. This week's list of givers is longer than either of the two preceding. The total already reached, $3,821.65, means that hundreds of orphans in the desolated district will be at once housed, fed, clothed and cared for by our missionaries, who know how to make every dollar tell. We wish to gather before Christmas all special gifts designed for these orphans, and friends intending to contribute will please see that their money reaches this office not later than Dec. 22. We cannot undertake after that date to forward by cable the sums received. Checks may be made out simply to The Congregationalist. For this week's acknowledgments see page 878.

Bishop John H. Vincent, dear to all friends of Chautauqua, is just departing for South America, where he expects to spend the next six months looking after the interests of Methodist churches.

Miss Frances E. Willard is authority for the statement that Josiah Flint, whose articles in The Atlantic and The Century on the tramps of Germany and this country have attracted so much attention, is a nephew of hers, the son of her only brother.

A Roman Catholic newspaper devotes nearly an entire editorial page to an abusive editorial about The Congregationalist. Probably not a dozen of our readers ever see that paper, and few of its readers ever saw the article which roused the ire of our contemporary. Cui bono?

Do our eyes betray us? Can it really be? "When Christian Endeavorers pray for the Jews, the Turks and the Chinese Empire, they should not fail to remember the advocates of righteousness in the press, and the tired, perplexed, harassed and sometimes discouraged man in the editor's chair." This is an Englishman's exhortation. American editors, of course, do not need any such thoughtful sympathy.

In view of the fact that many secular newspapers have assumed that ministers are not qualified to discuss political and financial matters, it is a special satisfaction to note that Rev. J. N. Hallock, D. D., the editor of Christian Work, has won the fifty dollar prize offered by the Brooklyn Eagle for the best 500-word argument in favor of the gold standard. More than 300 essays were sent in, many from ablest writers on the subject.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cook are boarding for the present in Newton Center. The distinguished invalid is somewhat better, though still far from well. His old passion for reading still burns within him, and the fact that he has read no less than 100 books since the first of last July is evidence that his intellectual faculties are still keen. We trust his present environment will prove favorable to more rapid improvement.

Bishop Galloway of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, whose address at the recent A. M. A. jubilee meeting will long be remembered by those who heard it, says that he is glad he was privileged to meet so many noble men then and there, and he adds this bit of truthful comment: "More social contact would help the sections of our country to see eye to eye on a greater variety of subjects. . . . Views would be less colored by provincialisms."

The Transcript thinks that its report of a verbal statement by Dr. Quint to the effect that the First Church of Christ, Scientist, was evangelical will be regarded as a decision which will have great weight in leading Congregational churches to give letters of dismission and recommendation to the aforesaid church. We think not. The opinion of Dr. Quint on that subject, written by his own dictation, which we printed last week, but which the Transcript passed unnoticed, will have greater weight.

The newly elected chief justice of Kansas has set forth his views concerning the ownership of property. He says, "The only law which the user of capital is bound to observe is that law which finds its origin, end and sanction in himself." This would seem to indicate that a borrower in Kansas is not regarded by the chief administrator of its laws as necessarily under obligation to pay his debts. The correlate of that deliverance naturally is that no one is under obligation to lend money where law is thus construed.

Many friends of Rev. J. W. Wellman, D. D., filled his pleasant home in Malden last Saturday to congratulate him on the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birthday. His former parishioners in Malden and from Newton were present in large numbers, and ministers and professors were abundant. The years sit lightly on the doctor and his wife, while to have such a group of children and grandchildren as were gathered there to rise up and call them blessed is enough to make the evening of life as enjoyable as it is beautiful.

The committee appointed by the Boston Ministers' Meeting to arrange for a public service to commemorate the life and work of Dr. A. H. Quint send out the following invitation:

> Knowing that Dr. Quint's fellowships with other bodies, social and fraternal, were numerous, and that a host of individual friends would be glad to unite in such a service, the committee extends a hearty invitation to all friends interested to unite in a public memorial service at Park Street Church, Boston, Monday, Dec. 7, at 2:30 P. M. The speakers will be, Dr. J. W. Wellman, Hon. W. H. Hodgkins, Dr. Arthur Little, Dr. E. A. Horton, Dr. W. H. Ward of The Independent and Pres. W. J. Tucker, LL. D., of Dartmouth College.

The death of Dr. Quint has left many vacancies in denominational bodies which indicate how influential a position he occupied and how large a service he rendered. Some of these vacancies have been filled by the appointment of Rev. Dr. W. H. Davis of Newton on the provisional committee of the National Council, Rev. William H. Moore of Hartford on the international committee and Mr. Thomas Todd of Boston on the publishing committee. Applications for assistance from the Massachusetts Board of Ministerial Aid should hereafter be sent to Rev. Edwin B. Palmer, Room 9, Congregational House, Boston, who has been chosen a member of the board and chairman of the executive committee in place of Dr. Quint.

Col. T. W. Higginson, in the December Atlantic, mourns somewhat over the fact that a professor of political economy at Harvard recently asked who Charles Brockden Brown was; and that a Harvard Senior recently confessed that he never had heard of John Fiske. Colonel Higginson cites these incidents as proof of the fact that the day of universal scholarship is past, that the day of specialization is here, and that the last of the old-fashioned Cambridge scholars of whom one could ask a miscellaneous question with the prospect of answer has been seen. But what shall be said of the eminent Boston publisher who recently revealed that he never had read Ian Maclaren's Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush? Does he specialize on the books he publishes?

Thanksgiving was made a bright day for the Armenian exiles in Boston through the kind forethought of such good friends as Mr. Gulesian, Dr. and Miss Blackwell, Mrs. Barrows and others. Nearly 200 sat down to a bountiful dinner, the company including beside the refugees prominent Armenian residents of the city and a number of Americans. The motto at one side of the hall, "We thank God for a land of freedom," expressed the sentiment of every guest, while those who cannot forget the recent past appreciated to the full the remark of one of the carvers, who said, as he flourished a big knife preparatory to an onslaught upon the bird of the occasion, that he was getting ready to help the Armenians present avenge themselves on Turkey. Among the after-dinner speakers were two doctors, a college professor and a clergyman—all of them exiles.

The remarkable character of Dr. Storrs's jubilee becomes all the more evident as we recede from it. Said Professor Park at Andover the other day, "I consider this the most wonderful demonstration of personal regard that has ever been manifested in this country." It would certainly be difficult to instance a parallel case of recognition by all classes in a great city of the professional abilities and personal greatness of one of its ministerial citizens. No less significant is this sentence from Joseph H. Choate's address before the magnificent assemblage at the Academy of Music that wound up the week's festivities: "You may search the annals of American cities in vain for such a spectacle. You must go back to Venice, to Athens or Florence in their palmiest days to find such an exhibition of civic spirit and civic pride as Brooklyn shows tonight." A notable literary feature of the celebration, which ought not to escape attention, was the jubilee number of The Pilgrim, the monthly published by the branch of the Church of the Pilgrims and edited by Dr. Storrs's associate in that work, Rev. E. H. Byington. The number, with its white and gold cover, its many pictures, its special articles by Bishop Potter, President Gates, Dr. Clapp and prominent members of the Church of the Pilgrims, and its dignified and uplifting Jubilee Hymn written by Mr. Byington himself, will be among the choicest memorabilia of the jubilee, and reflects credit upon the editor, as well as upon the business manager, Mr. Erickson. It was in this monthly that the picture of Dr. Storrs which we printed last week first appeared.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

Our Congregational Club.

Its topic on the 23d was The Permanent Lessons of the (Political) Campaign, and the appointed speakers were Hon. James L. Blair of St. Louis and Hon. Everett P. Wheeler of this city. Mr. Blair drew his first lesson from the dense ignorance shown by many voters on the commonest financial questions and on the elementary principles of our Government. The decision of most important matters could not safely be left with people of that caliber. The second lesson was drawn from the excitability of the multitude, and the third was from the neglect of their duty by citizens who should vote but do not. A great lesson of the campaign is that we have proved that we are able to govern ourselves.

Mr. Wheeler considered the Bible the best guide to political foresight, and that one of the greatest sins of our people is the choosing of ignorant, incompetent, selfish men as legislators. A campaign of education he held to be a continual obligation, and the seeing, each man in his own district, that competent men be sent to Congress and the legislature should be made a matter of conscience. The difference between a wise man and a fool is that the wise man does not make the same mistake twice.

Brooklyn's Ditto.

The Brooklyn Club on the same evening, its president, Dr. J. B. Clark, in the chair, honored itself by keeping fully up to the line of the week's honors paid to Dr. Storrs. To Dr. Clark's fitting introduction, he replied with one of his felicitous speeches, concluding with a brief résumé of his reasons for loving Congregationalism, "because of his ancestral connection with it, his ministry in it, its primitive forms of worship, making it a church that gets back very close to the apostles and the Master, the inspiring activities of its membership, and because it is the body where ultimate unity of the church visible is to become possible."

When Dr. Storrs had left the club, affectionately invoking upon its members, "every one," Tiny Tim's blessing, the topic of the evening was taken up. Dr. H. L. Wayland spoke—aptly and forcibly, as he always speaks—on Democracy in the Churches, and Gen. Stewart L. Woodford followed, showing how large hearted a Brooklyn Episcopalian can be when speaking of the great underlying principles of the Pilgrim churches and the lifelong service of the pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims. The audience was the largest ever seen at the club, and the occasion was most memorable.

The Clerical Union.

Our Clerical Union has had a series of unusually interesting and profitable meetings of late. Since the enthusiastic reports from attendants on the A. M. A. Jubilee Rev. Dr. Richards of Philadelphia has cheered his brethren with views that ought to be true and to be soon realized in their beginnings, on the Reunion of Christendom. Mr. W. R. George unfolded the character, aims and methods of his ingenious and original scheme, the George Junior Republic, described in The Congregationalist a few weeks ago, and which is one of the most wonderful enterprises in that line the world has ever seen. Rev. F. B. Richards, the pastoral assistant at the Broadway Tabernacle, spoke on Some Theological Bearings of the Study of Penology. And last week Prof. Francis Brown of Union Seminary let the brethren into some of the exoteric doctrines of the higher criticism. The term of Dr. Lysander Dickerman, the erudite Egyptian, having expired, Rev. W. T. McElveen, Ph. D., was last week chosen president of the union.

The Moody Meetings.

Beyond all question the interest in the Moody meetings deepens daily and larger crowds seek entrance to the Cooper Union Hall—many of them in vain. He has lengthened the series for a week or more beyond his original intention, and strong pressure is upon him from the city and neighborhood not to close the services while the interest continues, notwithstanding his engagements elsewhere. If possible, the friends of the work would hold him here until he goes to Boston for the Week of Prayer. The rapt attention and spiritual awakening evidently deeply stir his own soul, and all who know him best agree that he never did better service than he is doing now.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Ministers' Meeting.

The paper Monday morning by Dr. Phillip Krohn on Probabilities in Theology was of rare merit. True, most of the brethren who heard it were disinclined to accept some of its positions, feeling as they did that hardly sufficient prominence was given to certainties in theology, but no one failed to recognize the ability of its author, or the justice of his conclusions if one starts from his premises. All felt that it was well that attention should be directed to the part which probability fills in the conduct of life, and to the fact that it is no more unreasonable to recognize it as a motive for action in matters of religion than in matters which relate to the practical affairs of this life.

The Club.

The meeting this month was a Thanksgiving meeting. The chief address was by President Eaton of Beloit on Looking Back and Looking Forward. It was a review of the way in which our institutions were developed among our English ancestors, as well as among Pilgrims and Puritans, and the expression of hope and confidence that the development which, thus far, has been so full of blessing will continue for centuries to come. Two brief speeches from Prof. H. M. Scott and S. S. Rogers, Esq., on the way in which Thanksgiving should be kept closed the literary exercises of the evening. It was ladies' night. The attendance was fairly good, about three hundred being present.

Thanksgiving Services.

Thanksgiving Day in Chicago is noted for three things—charity, religious worship and football. Hospitals, eleemosynary institutions of all kinds and destitute families are always remembered with gifts of food, if with nothing else. Certain firms continue a practice inaugurated many years since of furnishing a dinner to the needy who will apply for it. The churches are in the habit of hunting up the needy and distributing their charity personally, in a way to preserve the self-respect of the receiver and at the same time manifest a sympathizing Christian spirit.

Religious services, especially on a rainy day like last Thursday, are not often largely attended. The Third Presbyterian Church holds a service of praise from nine to ten in the morning, in which three churches unite. This brings together four or five hundred people. The First Congregational, the Union Park, Leavitt Street and the Covenant Churches are accustomed to join in a single service. This year the service was in the Leavitt Street edifice and the sermon was delivered by Rev. J. T. Blanchard of the Covenant Church. At the Californian Avenue Church Rev. J. T. Silcox preached. Nine churches, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Lutheran and Congregational, united in the house of the Fullerton Avenue Presbyterian Church to listen to Dr. Phillip Krohn of the Lake View Church. The independent churches, the People's, that which worships in Central Music Hall, and the Church Militant, met in McVicker's theater, Dr. Thomas presiding, to hear addresses from Mr. Vrooman and Dr. Hillis. A Unitarian church, a Universalist church and the congregations of two synagogues met together in the Oakland Club Hall to hear a Jewish rabbi discuss the Perils and Hopes of Our Democracy. At the Fourth Baptist, where seven Baptist churches were represented, Dr. Greenel, pastor of one of these churches, directed the attention of his hearers to the Prospects of National Permanence.

Nearly all the speakers were inclined to optimistic views, but did not fail to point out the perils to which we are exposed. Many notable sermons were heard on Sunday, among them one by Dr. Noble, in which, after recognizing the hand of Providence in delivering us from recent dangers threatening the honor and prosperity of the country, he was careful to say, and say emphatically, that these dangers had their origin in a haste to obtain wealth and in a neglect of justice on the part of wealth and intelligence which it is the business of Christian people to rectify speedily and thoroughly. It is the feeling in this vicinity that all trusts and monopolies which exist at the expense of the people should be dealt with immediately, that educated men and business men may no longer shirk their duty as citizens, that the best and most competent men in society must unite to see that all just grounds of complaint made by laboring men and persons in moderate circumstances be carefully considered and, if founded in justice, removed with the least possible delay.

Voluntary Attendance at Prayers.

The University of Chicago has hitherto forced no one of its students or of its professors to attend its chapel exercises. The experiment cannot be said to have been satisfactory. Neither professors nor students have been present regularly or in large numbers. It has now been decided that hereafter a short chapel exercise shall be held at 10 30 A. M. four days in the week, at which it is expected that every member of the university once during the week, unless excused for good reason, will be present. Arrangements have been made by which members of different classes may meet together and in this way become better acquainted with each other than has been possible in the past. This dividing of the students and bringing them together on certain days of the week is necessary on account of the lack of a room in which all the members of the university can come together at one time. No want is greater at present than a chapel large enough for the patrons of the university. Not a little interest is taken in this latest decision of the authorities of the university in regard to religious exercises, as it confesses the failure of the voluntary system.

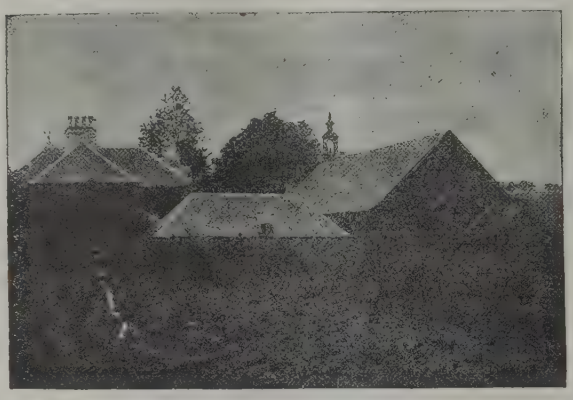
FRANKLIN.

Life in Drumtochty.

By Clifton Johnson.

"It's unearthly—a' these Americans comin' across here," was the comment of one of the older Drumtochty folk when he heard the news of our arrival in the region; for Drumtochty is a quiet, country district and the interest the outside world has shown in it of late is, to the average inhabitant, something past understanding. Since Ian Maclaren began to write, "Drumtochty" has become a household word with the reading public wherever English is spoken, and many a traveler from beyond the seas turns aside from the beaten tourist paths to see the region that has become so familiar in the pages of Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush and In the Days of Auld Lang Syne.

My wife and I spent nearly two months in Logiealmond, or Drumtochty, as Dr. Watson calls it. It is a widespreading farm and grazing district on the edge of the Highlands, about a dozen miles north of Perth. It has one little central village called Harrietfield, situated on a long slope, or "strath," that sweeps gently downward to where a final steep pitch drops into a winding half wooded ravine, in the depths of which flows the stony river Almond. From the village one has always in sight the blue ridges of the Grampians, cutting ragged lines into the sky along the north.



THE FREE KIRK AND MANSE, FROM THE REAR.*

Aside from this one village group on the strath the habitations of the region are scattered farmhouses and a few lonely shepherds' cottages on the borders of the moors. The glen has no resident gentry, though there is a shooting lodge at the head of a wild ravine up toward the hills and there is the big decayed mansion of Logie House just beyond the village borders in the midst of a grand park. Then there is Glen Almond College on a high terrace in plain sight across the river. You hear the college clock toll the hours and its bells chiming for evening service and you see its brown walls and pinnacles rising above the trees like some ancient castle. This college, I think, is never mentioned in Dr. Watson's stories and it seemed to conflict with one's sense of fitness. It made the scenes less completely rustic than one would wish, and, besides, what business has anything here that is not in the books?

LOOKING DOWN ON THE GLEN.*

The region as a whole is lacking in picturesqueness and beauty. You find these qualities in spots, but, in a casual view, Drumtochty is ordinary. It is transformed in the books by the imagination of the author. We were told that in the minds of former residents far removed it had always an Arcadian charm, but when such return they are disappointed. The present inhabitants see nothing extraordinary about the region or about themselves. They tell you of certain views from the hills and spots along the stream that are bonnie, but the rest they think is commonplace. Dr. Watson is a favorite in the glen and the people esteem him a very clever man. Most of them like his books very well, though rather on account of their local flavor than as literature. Nearly every one of the glen folk has read Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush. Only a few feel like affording to buy the book, but they gain their ends by borrowing. They do not recognize the reality of the descriptions of character, and the humor and the pathos is largely lost on them. One of the Drumtochty ministers in his delight over the book read a chapter at a meeting of his elders. But the elders were perfectly imperturbable and sat unmoved to the end. He did not try it again.

The most interesting view we got of the books was from the guard of the Kildrummie train who is himself one of the most realistically described of the author's heroes under the name of Peter Bruce. In his look and ways he is so exactly like the book character that every stranger who journeys to Drumtochty recognizes him at once, and they call him "Peter Bruce" quite independent of the fact that his real name is "Sandy" Walker. One first sees him when the train running east from Perth stops at Kildrummie Junction. The junction is simply a forlorn shed of a station with its accompanying platforms in the midst of some lonely farm fields. On the side track is Peter's train in waiting and Peter himself is there hurrying about, joking with the travelers and attending to the baggage and to the comfort of all those in his charge. After a delay of a very few minutes this gray little old man waves his hand to the engineer, snaps a last door shut and swings up to his van at the rear with a very youthful alertness. Then the train puffs away on the up grade toward Kildrummie—two or three miles distant.

It was a pleasure to watch Peter at the terminus, he was so bustling and good-natured and his eyes so full of twinkle. It seemed to come natural for him to get acquainted with all strangers and to find out their business the first time they ride on his train. He looks after the welfare of the passengers as attentively as if they were his children. One day when I had been exchanging some banter with him he turned to my wife of a sudden and asked, "Din ye believe in yon man?"

"Why, of course," was the reply.

"Then ye can believe in onything," said Peter, with a wink.

When we told him we came all the way from America to make pictures for Dr. Watson's books, he said, "I ca' that a silly errant, noo."

He always spoke as if he did not relish the notoriety the books had brought him, but I fancy that was mainly bluff. Probably it will be a long time before he sues Dr. Watson for "defamation of character," as he hinted was his intention. "O," he said, "I ken Watson fine, but," he added, "thae books are two-thirds lees. The Drumtochty men were aye a drunken lot. It's all very true aboot their stannin' aroon' on the junction platform, but it was na for the clatter that Watson tells aboot—it was because they was too drunk to know enough to get on. Thae was mony a time they had to be put on—pushed in like cattle or lifted like bags o' grain."

No doubt Peter's trials with the stubborn farmers from the glen, six miles distant, make him take an extreme view of their failings. But it is true that the Drumtochty folk and the Scotch in general drink beyond anything I am familiar with in our American country. Nearly all the farmers drink in moderation and even a church elder can stagger after a visit to Perth without losing caste. Few are hard drinkers at home or are habitual visitors to the inn. They treat friends and strangers when they call and indulge in a social glass at the "publics," but private tippling is rare. The tendency is at present to make liquor drinking less respectable and the younger generation feels a little sensitive about being seen drinking by the community's chief moral monitor, the minister.

We heard much of Dr. Leitch, who, very much idealized, is the lovable Dr. Maclure of the books. He has been dead now a score of years and you can see his stone in the little burying ground that huddles about the gray walls of the Established Kirk. But he was never any hero to the Drumtochty folk. Their view is quite disparaging. He was a picturesque figure, as awkward and rudely clad as he is in the book, and his professional methods were as rude as his outward appearance. Still he was a fairly good doctor.

Indeed, except for Peter Bruce, it would be difficult to fix on any one, past or present, who is the exact counterpart of the characters whom we know so well in the stories. One catches glimpses of the book people in all he sees of Drumtochty life and ways, and the manner of their speech Dr. Watson seems to have caught perfectly, but Burnbrae, Drumsheugh and the rest are the creations of the author's genius. One would have to travel far to find people more kindly and whole-souled than many of these Drumtochty folk. They make hospitality to a stranger a fine art, and if you ask a favor of some old farmer in a dress that any respectable scarecrow would be ashamed of he will grant it with a courtesy and a warm pleasure that make you love him on the spot. Yet the place is not Altruria. Good and evil exist there mixed very much as they do in the rest of the world. There are sharp dealings, rivalries, mean economies, dark lapses of morals and gossiping tongues, so that with the brightness there is plenty of sharply contrasted shadow.

Logiealmond as well as all the country around is owned by the Earl of Mansfield, one of the richest of Scotch landed proprietors. His residence is Scone Palace near Perth. One naturally thinks of him as the prototype of "Lord Kilspindie of Muirtown Castle," but unfortunately he does not resemble that courtly and generous gentleman to any marked degree. He is a champion of that sect of Presbyterians in Scotland known as the Established Church and he favors tenants of the same persuasion.

Harrietfield village, although it belongs to the earl, is not wholly in his power. It is built on land feud or leased to the tenants for a term of ninety-nine years, and about a quarter of this time is still unexpired. The village locally is commonly spoken of as "The Feus." It is a double row of stone houses with gardens in between. Here, too, are the United Presbyterian and the Free Kirk. Houses and churches both were built by the people, but all are the Earl of Mansfield's in twenty-six years. Nevertheless, there is no fear of any special severity, for whatever might be a landlord's personal pleasure he dare not go against the public sentiment of the nation, and the dissenters will continue to have their kirks and their ministers.

The Free Kirk is the one of which Dr. Watson was pastor in his early life. It is a plain stone building oddly situated at the back of the village, so that its only approach is by a zigzag lane. At the peak of the front gable is a bit of a cupola where hangs the bell, and the bell rope dangles down the wall outside. Inside the kirk is comfortably modern, and in this respect is quite the reverse of the antiquated interior of the Established Kirk two miles away at Chapel Hill. The latter has an old time high pulpit over-hung by a sounding board, and seats with backs so painfully perpendicular it makes one ache just to look at them.

But if the auditorium of the Free Kirk is uninterestingly modern, the vestry at the rear is just the opposite. It is so small one would think it had been built for a joke, and nothing could be truer to the reality than the humorous description of it in Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush. The Free Kirk manse adjoins the church. It is a pleasant house, pleasantly situated. It turns its back to the village, and looks down on a sweet little dell where the wild roses fling out their thorny arms piled high with rosy bloom, and where the village women trundle their barrows of washing to do their scrubbing by the burnside. The hills sweep up finely from here and the blue ranges of the Grampians dream in the distance. It was in these surroundings that Dr. Watson, lover alike of nature and his fellowmen, gathered the impressions that have given to the world these books of simple Scotch stories which have brought us all so much wholesome pleasure.

A STROLL PAST SIDEWALK BOOKSTALLS.

BY G. P. M.

Few of a city's possessions are more indicative of its past—and its present, too, for that matter—than its bookstalls. They tell whether the people in that city and the towns round about it have been given over to the mere struggle for existence and the accumulation of money, or whether they also have invested in "medicine for the soul," and sought to foster mental and spiritual growth by purchasing, if not publishing, many books.

Hence, as you wander about the streets of many of the prosperous but more modern manufacturing towns of New England, you need not expect to find displayed such collections of old books as you will find for sale in the older seaport and hill towns. Such collections presuppose more than the newer towns can furnish.

Obviously a city as ancient as Boston, the intellectual capital of a section inhabited by a people than whom there once were none more intelligent in this or any other country, must see drifting in to its bookshops the cherished collections of many individuals, dispersed because poverty or death or changed circumstances make collectors, or their heirs, willing to sell. The best of these books either find their way to the auction rooms and thence to the private or public libraries of the land, or they find a place on the shelves of the dealers, who generally know their value and demand a generous profit.

But fortunately there is a limit both to the shelf room of the dealers and to their omniscience, so out on the sidewalk bookstalls, where what they are pleased to call "rubbish" is stacked up to be sold for a nickel or a dime per volume, they deposit many books, some of which in time "come to their own again," and are the choice treasures of libraries whose owners are bibliophiles.

'Tis true that one who wanders down Cornhill, Boston, and Brattle, Milk and Bromfield Streets today will find these outer bookstalls to be the morgues where are displayed in ghastly array "the favorites of yesterday," as T. W. Higginson has recently called them. The stroller also will find many of the booklets about pious children who died young, which Agnes Repplier scoffs at in her delightful essay on Little Pharisees in Fiction, in the December Scribners. Nowhere else, save in special collections made by pedagogues for pedagogical purposes, can one so well determine by comparison the vast strides we have made in our schoolbooks, secular and religious.

But now and then a well-bound, well-printed edition of some standard work creeps in, bearing on its fly-leaf the signature of an earlier owner, or having an engraving or portrait or two that will be valuable in extra illustrating. Happy the man who knows a first edition when he sees it, or who recognizes in the signature the proof that it is either a presentation copy from the author of the book, or the former property of a noted man, or who perceives that the engravings are rare. There be such joys reserved even for men whose purses are lean.

Let us stroll down Cornhill today, and see what can be had for a nickel or dime.

William Law, the mystic and nonjuror, is too pious and unworldly to be a popular author in this day and generation, but the man who samples him will ever be his debtor. At least so thought Dr. Johnson and Gibbon. Believing this—in theory, at least—and feeling the necessity of A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, you naturally purchase a 1739 London edition of Law's book with that title, especially as you discover on its last page the bold, old-fashioned signature of William Pepperell. Comparison later with Pepperell's authenticated signature makes clear that you have unquestionably a book formerly owned and annotated by Sir William Pepperell, the capturer of Louisburg, America's first baronet.

Here is a well preserved volume called The Literary Miscellany, which superficial examination shows to be one of the earliest periodicals of its kind published in this country. This copy is penciled with the names of the authors of many of its articles, and you buy it, sure that it will prove a worthy addition to your slowly increasing collection of works on American journalism. Investigation later shows that it is a perfect file of a high grade literary journal to which Andrews Norton, S. Willard, and William Jenks and a notable group of other young Harvard graduates contributed in 1804–6, men who later were to achieve great prominence.

Sometimes in scanning the titles of these old books, especially those which grew out of the Trinitarian-Unitarian controversy, of which there are an innumerable number on the bookstalls now, testifying by their profusion and cheapness to the non-vitality of the controversy today, you are constrained to believe that in some respects an old bookstall is one of the saddest sights of a great city. It tells of so much misdirected thought and energy, so much thwarted ambition, so much misunderstanding of men and events. Here, for instance, is the volume of caustic attacks by George Lunt on Theodore Parker, R. W. Emerson, G. W. Curtis and the abolitionists, which first appeared anonymously in the Boston Courier in 1858. Who cares now what Mr. Lunt thought of Emerson, or how much he misunderstood Curtis? The logic of events and the verdict of history have annihilated his clever satire and pessimistic prophecies.

It is not a sightly tome that your eye rests upon now. Wind and rain have discolored its binding and marred its print, and there is nothing in its title to win your study, for it seems to be a memoir of a clergyman. But your eye as you run over the pages notices the names of John Randolph of Roanoke, Thomas Chalmers, the Scotch divine, and William Wirt appended to letters, and you see references to "a magazine," which make you think you have stumbled on the life of an editor. Secure in your study, with lamp lighted and easy-chair beneath you, in due time you ascertain that your battered volume is exceedingly interesting and the valuable repository of facts and opinions that shed much light on one of the earliest attempts at religious journalism in this country, namely the struggle of Rev. John H. Rice, D. D, to edit and establish a religious weekly and a literary monthly in Richmond, Va., in 1814–15. You arise from reading of it cognizant as never before of the dependence of the South of that day upon the North for its supplies of new books and educated ministers, and the service which Andover Seminary rendered to the cause of Christ by its co-operation with Virginia and Carolina Presbyterians. Here, too, are found most valuable hints as to the influence which slavery had upon the ecclesiastical life of the Old Dominion, and you hear mutterings of the coming storm.

You come back to the daily task after such a quest minus forty cents, but satisfied with the quid which you have if the dealer is satisfied with his quod.

IAN MACLAREN IN BOSTON.

ON THE PLATFORM.

Venerable men and women and delicate maidens do not stand in line for eight or ten hours to purchase tickets to readings by authors who are merely clever or notorious. There must be some stronger motive than proceeds from curiosity or love of amusement which will lead business men and artisans to give up their time and ladies in silks and servants in calicoes to endure hardship if by so doing they can see and hear the man whose books and sermons they have read and cried over. It is doubtful whether more convincing proof of the affection of readers for an author was ever manifested than was shown by the heterogeneous crowd of rich and poor, high and low, who suffered so much fatigue and worry the first day that tickets for Ian Maclaren's lectures were put on sale in Boston, fatigue and worry, too, that was quite unnecessary and might have been spared the public if there had been better management.

But who thought of the fatigue or incompetence when he sat in Tremont Temple at any one of the four readings and fell under the spell of the winning, delightsome, witty lecturer and interpreter of his own matchless creations? How genuine was the round of applause when Rev. Dr. George A. Gordon finished the graceful words of welcome with which he introduced Dr. Watson to his first Boston audience, and how the lecturer won his way to all hearts by his tender words of regret that his long anticipated visit to Boston could not be crowned and made perfect by a chat with the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table.

To say that Tremont Temple was filled at each of the four lectures would not be true, but it is true that more than 9,000 sittings were sold and that the audiences contained the flower of the people of Greater Boston. Distinguished clergymen always occupied the platform seats, but they were few compared with the many fellow-clerics who were scattered throughout the house. Tuesday evening a delegation of Scotchmen, clad in kilts and tartan, sat in the organ loft.

Of the many courtesies shown to Dr. Watson by Bostonians the most notable perhaps was Mrs. James T. Fields's entertainment of him on Thanksgiving Day. There he received from the physicians of the city a beautifully worded testimonial and some choice flowers, their demonstration of respect and gratitude to the man who has made the philanthropy and skill of the average physician immortal in his classic portrayal of Dr. William Maclure.

IN THE PULPIT.

Eager as Bostonians were to hear Dr. Watson on the platform, many were still more desirous to ascertain by the hearing of the ear what message he would bring on the Sabbath day when he stood up to set forth the Christian gospel. More than an hour before the doors were opened the throngs began to gather at the entrances of Old South Church, and by a little after ten every seat was taken, the pew-holders and their special friends being the only ones admitted up to that time. When at 10.30 the doors were opened and outsiders admitted in half a dozen different installments, the number thus privileged were only a fraction of the great multitude who knocked in vain. Within the scene was a memorable one. Hundreds stood throughout the service and hung upon every word of the preacher, whose discourse occupied sixty minutes. The chaste splendor of the edifice was a fitting setting for the congregation representing so much in the way of culture, intelligence, appreciativeness and Christian character.

If Dr. Watson were wearied with the exactions upon him during his American tour he succeeded in covering up all traces of the fact. He preached as if he loved to preach. His manner resembled his platform style of speech, and, indeed, all the characteristics—humor, pathos, vivid word picturing—that make his stories and his lectures so fascinating pervaded the discourse. Dr. Gordon happily introduced the speaker, terming him the guest of all good hearts within our borders. Dr. Watson's theme was The Optimism of Jesus. He took Zaccheus as an instance of a man in whom the Pharisees saw no good, but in whom Jesus saw possibilities of a son of Abraham and a son of God. The strength of the sermon lay in part in its realistic descriptions of Zaccheus and other individuals. The four points developed were: first, in every man there are two selves; second, we can appreciate either the lower or the higher self in our brother; third, the higher self is the real man; fourth, if we wish to save our brother believe in the better side of him.

Dr. Watson's hand was not grasped after the sermon by one in a hundred who would have been glad to have expressed their appreciation of the helpfulness of his sermon. But when he left Boston, Sunday night, for New York, he must have carried with him the conviction that no city in the country contains in proportion to its population more of his admirers and wellwishers. Dr. and Mrs. Watson sail for Liverpool Dec. 16.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, NOV. 27.

The calendar topics being appropriate to Thanksgiving season, Miss Valentine of Woburn read selections from the Sixty-fifth Psalm and the epistle to the Philippians.

Mrs. Kellogg, quoting the text, "Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me," spoke of the privilege of thanksgiving and of the manifold causes afforded by a retrospection of the growth of mission work during the century.

Miss Emily Wheeler said we ought to go to mission fields in order to appreciate the many things which should call for our gratitude here. Some one in her hearing had said we could easily omit from our list of mercies the minor things, such as good roads, but Miss Wheeler thought of the wretched roads in Turkey, of the springless vehicles, the utter absence of anything like horse cars or railroad trains, and felt that such blessings as good transportation service were by no means to be counted as small. Think of having to order household supplies for a whole year, instead of day by day or week by week, and of the trial of having some spoiled by the way or give out altogether. She recalled one can of baking powder left from the looting of their home in Harpoot because the mob thought it contained dynamite, and what a treasure it was in the missionaries' depleted stores and how thankful they were for it.

Mrs. Carrie P. Fowle, recently returned from Cæsarea with her family, recurred to the Thanksgiving day of last year, kept midst dangers and anxieties and followed the next day by massacre and distress. She was thankful to have her children out of that atmosphere of bloodshed and terror, and she thought of her husband, probably returning to his field over such a road as Miss Wheeler had described, and of his thankfulness in the thought of the safety of his family. Mrs. J. K. Browne read a letter from her husband written at Arabkir, telling of fully attended meetings but of destitution and suffering on every side.

Mrs. DeForest of Japan gave as causes for thanksgiving that we have no tidal waves here such as have brought dire disaster there, that the Red Cross Society, organized during the war, had proved efficient in relief work after the tidal waves, and that the younger evangelists in Japan were showing themselves most efficient in their line of effort. After a series of brief prayers of thanksgiving, Mrs. Thompson quoted the headings of two chapters of a book she had read years ago. "I must pray more," "I must praise more."

Men must look each other in the face and construct prayer or sermon with the human alphabet.—Julia Ward Howe.

A GREAT CHICAGO MISSION.

The nineteenth year of the Pacific Garden Mission has now closed. The meetings held every night during the year were attended by more than 200,000 persons in the aggregate and were larger than in any previous year. As far as can be judged not a meeting has been held without conversions. The audiences range from four to five hundred and embrace persons of every race and strangers from every part of the country. The mission, through correspondence with those who have been blessed by it, is in close touch with almost every part of the English-speaking world. Through these converts, who do not forget the influences which reached them, and who are striving to serve the Master in the place where their lot is cast, the mission is making its power felt more widely year by year. The mission has certainly solved the problem how to reach and hold the masses. It is by the simple, hearty, friendly and honest preaching of the gospel. Situated in darkest Chicago, with no attempt to conceal the hatefulness of sin and the wretchedness it invariably causes, it finds eager listeners night after night and witnesses constant proofs of the power of the grace of God to change the human heart, as its managers say, to exhibit the same transforming power as is described in the gospel of John and in the Acts of the Apostles. Two gospel wagons are now carrying the message of life every evening to different sections of the city and are reaching six or eight hundred persons every day. Visits to the Bridewell and the prisons and to the sick in hospitals have also become a prominent feature in the work of the converts. The Sunday afternoon meeting for the study of the Bible has drawn together a class of nearly one hundred, men chiefly, in which many are trained in the skillful use of the Scriptures. A bureau of information through which inquiries are made for long lost friends or relatives seems to meet a pressing want. While no one can estimate the amount of good the mission has accomplished in the way of winning men for Christ, it is recognized by city officials as a crime preventing agency and as such worthy the support of all order loving people. The cost of the mission the past year was a trifle over $6,200. Of this sum about a quarter came from Mrs. Colonel Clarke, the superintendent, who in addition to giving her time to the mission is by far the largest contributor to it.

On a recent Monday morning the ministers listened to an account of the work of this mission as furnished in the words and appearance of three of the men who have recently been converted in it. Each one of them had fallen low, but by the grace of God was brought to a consciousness of his real condition as a sinner and led to break away from the power of sin and enter upon the service of God. All of them are now in positions of trust and are earnest in their efforts to help those who are still in bondage to Satan. One of the three who addressed the meeting was an ex convict, another a reformed drunkard, who, with his wife, is keeping a home for the rescue of erring women, and the third an Irishman, who from great wealth and high social standing in his own country had been brought, by the loss of property and his own habits, to a condition in which he felt himself an outcast and a disgrace, not only to his family, but to human nature. The story of the conversion of these three men and the account of the work they are now doing ought to be repeated in as many of our churches as possible. It would convince those who may have begun to think that one's faith is a matter of indifference that there is nothing so true as the gospel, and no means so certain to help men to their feet as the bold and constant proclamation that the wages of sin is death while the gift of God in Jesus Christ is eternal life.

FRANKLIN.

THE APPLE CHARITY.

Depleted cupboards in many Boston homes have depended, to a greater or less extent, for about six weeks past upon the generous providence of New England farmers, whose orchards have fortunately escaped the blight of the general stress of the times. Just how it came about that an entirely free and ample supply of fruit has been stored almost at the doors of needy and worthy families is a story whose interest centers in the novelty and growth of the movement, but which cannot contain a full statement of the success and all the benefits of the work.

This is not the first chapter in the history of New England fruit offerings. As long ago as 1878, at the suggestion of Mr. D. L. Moody, the farmers of Northfield, and others following their example, sent 1,400 bushels of apples to the Boston City Missionary Society. Rev. D. W. Waldron of that society successfully conducted the proper distribution of the fruit among nearly 600 families. It is worthy of mention that such generosity was an incentive to like deeds in another direction. The same year a brother, who feared that the "sour apples might set the children's teeth on edge," gave 500 gallons of syrup "to neutralize any such result."

Two years later the same movement was repeated, and the City Missionary Society became the medium between farms and families for distributing over 4,000 bushels of apples, pears, peaches and various vegetables among more than 1,500 households.

This year the society has shouldered the management of a fruit offering which became spontaneous at the call repeated by Mr. Moody. His suggestion was all that was necessary and both parties met in mutual service. The contents of the carloads were sent in small quantities all over Boston, from the freight houses directly to the homes of needy ones, all of whom were known as worthy of such attention. A bushel or a bushel and a half is the gift to each household. Up to date between 2,500 and 3,000 bushels have been distributed. The girls at the Northfield school encouraged the suggestion at the start by subscribing $20 for 500 bags, all the other bags which have been used being a gift from individuals.

The offer of a New Hampshire young woman to place a carload of apples at the disposal of the Associated Charities of this city, for free distribution among the poor, was the starting of another avalanche of fruit which, like the first, has come down from western Massachusetts, Maine and New Hampshire in such quantities as to require the special attention of a manager at the Boston end to receive, store and dispense with care and caution. Rev. R. B. Tobey was asked to undertake the superintendency of the work, and his hesitancy at the outset was at once set aside by the generous offer of Rev. Dr. E. E. Hale, representing the Lend-a-Hand Club, to provide for the expenses of distribution in the city. Once started, these streams also needed little stimulation—offer following offer from various scattered sections. The pressing necessity of cheap and speedy transportation from fields to firesides was greatly relieved in both cases by the willingness of the railroad corporations centered in Boston to convey the supplies without charge. The free use of a storehouse, means for conveying the fruit thereto from the cars and a great supply of paper bags of large capacity were encouraging additional offers from magnanimous business firms and individuals. Only sorted apples, as a rule, are sent out for distribution, and they include cooking and eating apples and on the average are in excellent condition.

The different mode of management in this second movement, i. e., distribution from a central station and district points to individuals rather than direct from the cars to the homes, has necessitated the use of the fifteen district headquarters of the Associated Charities, which are scattered over the twenty-five wards of the city, and eleven other stations, including, beside those given up entirely to this work, such places as St. Andrew's House, Olivet, Ruggles Street and Every Day Churches. The contents of boxes, barrels and bags of all sizes and many shapes have multiplied the hundreds of bushels which have filled the great bins at headquarters over and over, and these in turn have been drawn upon by the cartload to provide the substations of distribution, several wagons being used exclusively to fill the orders of the latter. Thus the expenses and difficulties of actually placing these small quantities of fruit in the kitchens of large families have been reduced to nothing as far as the recipients are concerned and to a minimum for the givers and managers of both offerings.

The busy times at the distributing stations are before or after school hours, when troops of children are hurried off from home to return laden with such burdens as light hearts and willing arms are able to bear. We have seen big and little children cherrily staggering off under the weight of loads which they could hardly carry. And without exception the general appearance of these burden bearers was such as to indorse their request for the gifts. The rule requiring the presentation of a ticket from an authorized source, guaranteeing the request for fruit, has been strictly observed, and, when necessary, receipts have been the vouchers for the proper delivery of large quantities. Careful records show that in the distribution of this latter offering 3,520 bushels of apples were handled, and that 40,663 individuals were reached, over 20,000 of them through the various institutions employed.

How glad the cheerful workers in the orchards—groups of well-fed country children, men and women—would be to hear the "Thank you's" which should be shared with them. They would feel overpaid by even a look at the grateful faces of those whom they have helped to make happy.

The accounts of families which have lived on "charity apples" and nothing more for days at a time are not unreal, and needy households have made not a few meals from them alone.

CLOISTERED.

BY IDA WHIPPLE BENHAM.

Two souls I saw, as in a dream,
Immured in cloisters leagues apart;
And each, I thought, did haply seem
Engraven on the other's heart.
But one was joyful in her sphere—
Four narrow walls dim lighted, cold—
And prayed for him, year after year,
With lips grown tremulous and old;
Contented with her human lot
Because for him she still could pray,
And God knew—though he knew it not.
Lone in his cloister far away.

Self was the cell that wrapped around
With iron walls that other soul;
In rusty links his limbs were bound;
He felt the heavy seasons roll—
Nor knew the days were good and bright,
Nor knew the years were glad and free,
But shut his heart to joy and light
And threw away life's liberty.
He hoarded, and he told his gains
In gold and silver—yet so poor
That when they heard him clank his chains
They pitied him both slave and boor.

Perhaps some day the chains may fall,
His eyes grow clear that now are dim;
God's heart is great, who loves us all—
And still one woman prays for him.

The late President Seelye once said that he knew of scarcely any cause from which the country suffers so much as the custom of parents to delegate altogether to others the training of their children. The father, in particular, feels that he has fulfilled his whole duty if he attends to the finance department of the home. He hands over to others the training of the child's mind and soul. Yet a man cannot assist in educating his child without at the same time, and in a much greater degree, educating himself. As a result there is a real impoverishment of his own character, while the effect upon his offspring is to weaken that beautiful relationship between father and child which is one of the most tender of all human ties.

The proposition made by Mrs. C. L. Goodell, to divert a portion of our Christmas gift money this year into channels of benevolence, is meeting with a cordial approval. One lady writes: "If we can be brave enough to defy custom in the matter of perfunctory giving only, giving because we imagine it is expected of us, there would be a harvest for the needy without encroaching on our gifts of love to real friends. But in times like these, with such appalling distress within reach, friends ought gladly to join in mutual consecration of their gift money." A practical proof of her own willingness to cooperate in the plan suggested was a generous check in behalf of the Armenian orphans. Multitudes whom we know nothing about have doubtless followed her example and we hope the mention of this particular case may stimulate others to go and do likewise.

The influence of pictures upon children is recognized in a beautiful way by the church in Newtonville, Mass. The room in which the infant department of the Sunday school meets is adorned with choice photographs of the best paintings which illustrate the life of Christ from the annunciation to the ascension. These are framed, either singly or in groups, and hung at a level adapted to childish eyes, making a most attractive wall decoration entirely around the room. They serve another purpose in helping to elucidate the lessons from week to week. But apart from this practical consideration the value of such a scheme of decoration is worth all its costs for its unconscious influence upon childish souls. Pictorial representation of isolated scenes in our Lord's life are frequently seen in Sunday school rooms, but we know of no place except Newtonville where the chronological order of events from his birth to his ascension is thus portrayed.

How far is Ian Maclaren right in saying that a decrease in attendance upon public worship, which he claims is the fact in most countries, is due to a decline of parental authority? On this point he remarks: "Once all the children were expected to be in their pews with their parents every Sunday. Nowadays even a ten-year-old child is allowed to have his likes and dislikes about the preacher and express his opinion as to whether he will or will not attend church." If this is generally the case, it might be well to inaugurate a reform by adopting the method followed in a certain New York home where there are seven children. Until reaching the age of eighteen they are held as strictly to attendance at church as at school. The parents assume a right to exact obedience in this and certain other well defined duties that belong to the period of youth. On reaching the age specified individual choice is allowed, but the habit of church-going thus established is not readily abandoned.

SOME HOPEFUL SIGNS IN LITERATURE AND ART.

BY ESTELLE M. HURLL.

As we examine the new bulletins of the publishing houses we discover a surprising amount of literature, present and prospective, centering in the life of Christ. I do not mean works on theology or books of Bible selections, year-books, etc., but a new Christ literature, which is more distinctly the work of the creative imagination and is cast in the literary form of a novel. Just two years ago a large Sunday school publishing house issued as a prize story a book called Titus: A Comrade of the Cross: A Tale of the Christ. So eagerly was it received by young and old alike that edition after edition appeared, until there are now in circulation some 650,000 copies of the American edition, to say nothing of the numerous translations which have found their way into nearly every important country of the world. No critic would give Titus a place of high rank for purely literary merits, yet its phenomenal popularity makes it clear that it filled a long-felt want. Like its great predecessor, Ben Hur, which undoubtedly served as an ideal for the prize competitors, it makes the personality of Jesus real and vivid, and, however great the distance between Lew Wallace and Florence Kingsley, the latter's success is not incomparable with the former's in touching the heart of the people. The David C. Cook Company has now followed Titus with the Wrestler of Philippi, by Fannie E. Newberry, and from the Century Company comes the Swordmaker's Son, by W. O. Stoddard, both juvenile books.

All books of the Ben Hur type may be classed together as fiction, in which the historic figure of Christ plays a part. The main plot is purely imaginary, and is crossed only here and there by incidents in the life of Christ. This method may be reversed, and we may have, instead, a story in which Christ's life itself constitutes the chief thread of the narrative, crossed here and there by incidents in the lives of imaginary or partly imaginary characters. In this way we get the incidents of Christ's life as they impress his contemporaries, historical or fictional. The method is, so far as I know, a new one, and it is an interesting coincidence that two books of this kind should appear simultaneously, one for juveniles and one for adults. John Gordon's Three Children of Galilee* is a life of Christ for young people, based strictly upon the gospels, but relating each incident as viewed by, or in some way related to, one or more of the three imaginary children who figure as dramatis personæ in the narrative.

Miss Woods selects for her Tale of King Messiah† only a few leading incidents of Christ's ministry from the baptism to the resurrection, and interprets them for us through the medium of a group of strongly individualized characters. Some of the persons of the drama are entirely imaginary, but the most prominent are the historic figures of the gospels as Miss Woods herself conceives them, the chief among them being John, the beloved disciple, whose name gives the title to the book. Miss Woods's work bears the stamp of great earnestness and reverence. She has little dramatic gift but genuine insight into the truth.

The book marks an era in Christ literature as the forerunner of the new type of the life of Christ. In all previous works the life has been written as a historical narrative, and the field has been worked until exhausted. We are now to have the life from an imaginative standpoint, told as a novel rather than as a history, as a drama rather than as a narrative. Three great imaginative writers of the day have promised to undertake the task: John Watson, S. R. Crockett and Hall Caine. Each is fitted for the task by peculiar gifts of the imagination. John Watson has a remarkably sympathetic insight into character, Crockett has a more delicate vein of sentiment, which is unique, Hall Caine has by far the greatest dramatic power. One can imagine that Watson will best understand the relation of Peter to our Lord, Crockett will treat most successfully the character of John, and Caine will dramatize forcibly the defection of Judas. As to the light which each will shed on the personality of Jesus, the central figure, we must wait and see.

Side by side with the new impulse towards a Christ literature is the movement towards a Christ art. The last ten years have witnessed a great revival of interest in art of the Italian Renaissance. This has of necessity led to a wider knowledge of sacred art, as the greatest works of the greatest masters almost invariably treated themes from the life of our Lord. Thus Raphael's crowning work is The Transfiguration, Leonardo da Vinci's, Last Supper, Tintoretto's, The Crucifixion. The study of such works as these make the scenes of Christ's life very real and familiar. They are the pictorial dramatization of his life, which corresponds to the literary dramatization of which we have been speaking. In the period which gave them birth they were the only record of his acts given unto the people. Now, indefinitely multiplied by process reproduction and scattered broadcast over the world, they awaken the same enthusiasm in the nineteenth-century Christian that they did in the Christian of 400 years ago. And this enthusiasm creates a demand for more sacred art, an art which shall unite with the reverent spirit of the old masters the larger knowledge of our own times, both as regards exegetical interpretation and archæological setting. This will be the art of the twentieth century, and it is already beginning to make itself known. A colossal work of art illustrating the life of Christ in some 400 pictures—pen drawings and water colors—is soon to be issued in France. It is the work of James Tissot, who has devoted ten years of arduous study to his task.

Now what does it mean that a celebrated and successful artist turns aside from his previous lines of work to devote ten years to the pictorial dramatization of the Christ life? What does it mean that three foremost novelists of the time turn aside from fiction to the literary dramatization of the Christ life? Are not these signs of the times? And do they not mean that as the nineteenth century draws to a close it is with an awakening sense of the power of Christ's personality, a new longing for vivid personal contact with him who is the same yesterday, today and forever?

A LADY OF CLAY.

BY LETITIA JEAN SMYTH.

IN THREE PARTS. PART I.

Roger Cameron was leaning back in an easy-chair, waiting for his servant to announce the carriage that was to take him to the Van der Poole ball. The shaded light from the bronze candelabra above him revealed traces of fatigue on the fine face and deepened the lines of serious thought about the well-formed mouth. Great, strong fellow that he was, he had to admit a feeling of unwonted weariness. It had been a busy day with the young physician, just preceding the glad Christmas—a call to a dying man at early dawn, a trying operation at the hospital all the morning, and an afternoon of love labor among his poor folk, distributing dinners and doses to suffering humanity in one of the squalid districts. It was no wonder that a sigh escaped him at the thought of the brilliant ballroom, where he was in honor bound to spend half the night.

Yet it was not mere physical weariness that put him out of harmony with the glare and gayety. He was usually glad of an opportunity to shake off the morbid effects of what he called a "heavy day." He knew his own sensitive temperament—so keenly acute to other people's pain and sorrow—too well to underrate the necessity of an occasional relaxation, and he frowned upon physical indisposition as one of the innumerable temptations to "professional hermitage," against which at the outset of his chosen career the young man had resolved to wage active warfare. But somehow, tonight there were scenes in his mind which he could not banish, try as he would. Wretched dwellings of misery and sin rose before him, side by side with the palace where half the city's wealth would be represented tonight. The contrast was startling and it deepened the thought that had impressed him today as never before, of the great gulf fixed between rich and poor. Was it fixed too deep and wide ever to be safely bridged?

"Hold on there, Roger, my boy, or you'll land yourself before the civil authorities as a supporter of anarchistic doctrines!" He laughed to himself, but the next moment the grave thoughtfulness came back to his face. Why should some members of the human family be so infinitely below their fellows? Was there a hard, cruel deity ordaining for his creatures destinies like these? Or was life all a mammoth lottery, one stupendous game of chance? When a man's soul is stirred with the great unsolved problems of the human brotherhood, it is then that his faith in an all-wise Providence is sorely tried.

Roger continued his soliloquy. He accepted the existing order of society, but why did not the upper class, so called, put forth strenuous personal efforts to lift the fallen ones to the higher plane? True, the city's wealth poured golden streams into the coffers of the missions; but why only reach down by proxy—why not come down to the lower level with hearts of tender sympathy and brotherly kindness?

Some of the families that he had visited today had already been provided with Christmas comforts. In every case some one whom they all called "Mis' Ellie" had been the generous benefactor. One aged Irishman, who had long been lying in helpless rheumatic agony, proudly displayed to the "docther" a set of warm flannels which he affirmed was "Mis' Ellie's" handiwork.

"An wad yez belave it, masther docther, but she didn't jist buy thim up aisy loike, an' sind thim along wid wan o' thim foine sarvant gintlemen, but she sewed thim together wid her purty hands, an' brocht thim herself. Ay! but she's the gran' loidy, bliss her!"

The old bricklayer's words had haunted Roger all day. They contained the very gist of his pet theory that, after all, it was only the close personal touch of living sympathy that would ever draw poor, distorted humanity back to the first fair image. This "gran' loidy, Mis' Ellie," whoever she might be—Roger fancied her a wealthy maiden lady, with gray curls and a kind old face—she, at least, had gotten down to the root of true charity and had discovered that "the gift without the giver is bare" indeed.

It often occurred to Roger what a magnificent work this would be for certain men and women whom he met now and then in social life. What power, he wondered, must play before they could be brought to feel their responsibility as individuals in the elevation of their down-trodden fellow-creatures? There was Elinor Morton, for instance—somehow Roger had come to let Miss Morton stand for any possible perfect type of his fancy—beautiful, gifted queen of the circle in which she moved, infinitely superior to the members of her "set" in talents and intellect, yet throwing away her God-given right to reign upon the frivolous worldlings who ranged themselves as adoring vassals round her throne. Sometimes Roger fancied that he could read an expression of discontent and restlessness on the proud, beautiful face, and once, when he told her briefly of a pitiful fever case which had detained him at the hospital on one of her "at home" evenings, a low, passionate exclamation had escaped her involuntarily, and her dark eyes had softened to an expression that Roger had never seen in them before. He had never forgotten that incident, nor how quickly the old hauteur and coldness had returned when some one interrupted them. But that one moment of unrestrained intercourse, though it left him more puzzled and perplexed than ever as to the girl's real character, made it impossible for him to go back to his old concept.

Tonight Roger found himself asking what the result would be if this fair girl, turning from the vanities of her life, should step down into the midst of the sin and sorrow stricken and tell them in her beautiful voice that "One was their Master, even Christ," and she and they belonged to the same love-bound family. Ah! how they would worship her, those poor lowly ones, out of whose lives all love and beauty had been crushed, and how eagerly they would strive to make themselves worthy of this royal kinship! Surely a love service such as this would be far more truly regal than the selfish sway of the society scepter.

Lately people had begun to couple Miss Morton's name with that of Huntingdon Delafield, a young fashionable whose family and fortune made him altogether desirable as a parti—provided that soul and intellect were not required. But Roger, having had that instant's revelation of the heart Miss Morton was hiding beneath her haughty indifference, told himself that such a union was impossible. It was beyond all belief that Miss Morton could bind herself to a narrow-minded man like Delafield, and yet he could not but admit that "society" had foundation for its forecasts and inferences.

"A beautiful mystery," he said, with a half sigh, "and tonight I make my last endeavor to find you out, Queen Elinor. My Christmas greeting to you—the waxen azaleas, white and perfect enough, yet giving forth no fragrance to sweeten the world around them, are a type of your fair, cold self to the world's weary ones, and if you will let me I will interpret their message to you:

> "Where is the use of the lip's red charm,
> The heaven of hair, the pride of the brow,
> And the blood that blues the inside arm—
> Unless we turn, as the soul knows how,
> The earthly gift to an end divine?
> A lady of clay is as good, I trow."

A sudden tingling of electric bells echoed through the apartment, and brought the socialistic meditations to an abrupt end. Roger reached for his great-coat, chanting to a college tune his favorite quotation from the Scottish poet:

> "Then let us pray that come it may—
> As come it will for a' that,
> . . . . . .
> That man to man the world o'er > Shall brothers be for a' that."

"I'll be right out," he said, as his big valet appeared at the door.

"It's just a bit of a boy, sir, I didn't know would you want to be annoyed by 'im?" Barney's majestic personality betrayed evident signs of perturbation.

"Certainly, Barney, show him in. Who is he?"

For answer, a small specimen of Americo-Arabian pushed past Barney's imposing stature and stood before Roger, breathless. The handsome face bent kindly down to the ragged street waif, and two strong, warm hands took the little half-frozen ones in a friendly grasp.

"Well, my boy, what can I do for you?" There was a hearty ring in the deep voice that touched the poor little fellow with a strange new feeling.

"Please, sir, it's 'bout Jamie wot sells de dailies on de Av'noo. Yer knows Jamie—he's me chum, an' he's been runned over, an' he says as he's a dyin', an' I says as how I'd come fer yer so's he wouldn' die. An' say! Mister docter, ef yer does'n let Jamie die, I'll give yer all I makes on de shines till I pays yer!"

Roger turned his face away rather abruptly. Strange that mud-splash on his coat sleeve should demand such close attention just then!

"The carriage, sir," Barney announced, stiffly.

"All right, tell the driver East Third Street, and you, little lad, you come with me." A moment later Dr. Roger Cameron of the "Av'noo," and the little East Side bootblack were sitting side by side, whirling rapidly through the noisy streets to "Jamie."

HOW THE REFUGEES WERE SAVED.

BY ELLEN KNIGHT BRADFORD.

The sun had dropped low down the Western sky,
When a ship at her anchor lay straining close by Old Smyrna, the land where Homer once sung,
Where Cybele ruled when the gods were young.
The British ship Boyne, with her fragrant freight
From the land of the olive, the fig and the date,
Was waiting her papers, when over the hills,
Grown red with the blood that the Moslem spills,
Came the noise of the conflict—the cloud-burst of pain,
That told yet again of Armenia's slain!

Redoubling his watch, the brave Captain espied
A frail little bark close to starboard side
Of his own great ship, while an aged man
By terror made fleet, up the gangway ran.
"O, Captain, good Captain, have mercy," cried he,
"Six others are with me, O, put out to sea—
Away from this hell and the Turk's bloody hand,
O, carry us anywhere far from this land!"

The blood of the Briton within him was stirred.
"Aboard with them, drift their boat loose," was his word
To his mate. To his steward, "Now give them relief
In the shape of a meal on our good British beef."
The words were scarce uttered when, scenting their prey,
Twelve broad-turbaned Turks rushed up the gangway,
And one of them gruffly, "Now give us," cried he,
"The Armenians aboard, ere you put out to sea."

Then up spoke the Captain, "No, never will I
While the British flag floats o'er my ship, I will die
And so will my men, every man of my crew,
Before we'll surrender these victims to you."
They insisted, entreated and talked themselves hoarse,
And swore if denied them they'd take them by force.
The limit of time they would fix at next day
Precisely at sunrise, and then rowed away.

Alone in the harbor, no friendly ship nigh,
With night on the water and clouds in the sky,
The Briton bethought him of help down the bay,
Where at anchor a cruiser from Italy lay.
So he manned up his gig and he muffled his oars,
And out in the darkness, away from the shores
Of Smyrna, he sailed till he lay at the last
Where the ship of King Humbert her anchor had cast.

Then he spoke to her captain, "Commander," quoth he,
"I have here refugees from Armenia with me;
In the name of the flag of my country, and more,
In the name of humanity, help I implore!"
"I am here, sir," the haughty Commander replied,
"To care for the subjects of Humbert, beside
His interests no other have I. As for you,
Your queen must protect her own subjects, adieu."

Dawn broke, the Boyne's furnaces reddened like gore,
The steam from her safety valves hissed, and before
The sun's rising the ship's crew were all on the deck.
Soon, out through the mists, they discovered a speck
Pricking out from the haze, fast it grew, mid the din.
"Bring my glass," cried the Captain, "A ship's coming in!"

He leveled his glasses—"Now heaven be praised,
'Tis the white Minneapolis." Then how they raised
Three wild British cheers for the stripes and the stars
O'er America's warship, those brave British tars!

Then quickly the gig from her davits was swung,
And their ensign reversed from the halyards was hung,
It was all understood ere the rippling tide
Brought the Captain along to the great warship's side
Where the strong "Jacob's ladder" was dropped, and it seemed Like the vision of old, when the patriarch dreamed
Of the succoring angels. His story was told,
And a friend he soon found in the Admiral bold.

"Those men, every one, you shall carry from port
If I bombard the town and riddle their fort,"
Spake the Admiral. Then, "Man a barge, let all join"
(Was his order) "to save refugees on the Boyne."
Soon the Boyne shipped her cables, and sailing forth free,
The white Minneapolis bore her to sea,
Till safely from port she could trust her to go
To the land where th' oppressor no harbor can know.

Then a farewell she gave and three loud rousing cheers
Rose over the waters to gladden the ears
Of England's brave sailors, and then three times three
For America's braves wafted over the sea!
But as good Captain Fisher steamed up New York Bay
His papers were wanting, and all he could say
Was to tell just this story—how Selfridge and he Brought the stricken Armenians over the sea.

Old England, we all know, believes in Free Trade,
But we're sure that whenever request shall be made
For American Protection 'twill ever be given
As freely as air or as sunshine from heaven!

ALL AROUND THE HOUSE.

Doors and windows that are troublesome to open and shut on account of being swollen by damp weather will often run easily if castile soap is rubbed along the places that stick fast.

Water is more apt to be impure in winter than at other seasons, because the ice upon its surface prevents a sufficient oxidation of the organic matter which collects thereon. And contaminated drinking water is the prolific source of typhoid.

Besides making the bed of an invalid as comfortable as possible, special care should be exercised to have it thoroughly aired. The whole bed should be taken to pieces every morning and each piece of bed clothing, as well as the mattress, separately exposed to the action of the air.

A German scientist says that a sprig of parsley dipped in vinegar and eaten after one has partaken of onions will remove all evidence of odor from that wholesome but objectionable vegetable. A spoonful of vinegar in the water in which they are boiled is also recommended as a preventive of odor.

An attempt to revive the fashion of canopied bedsteads and bed curtains should be frowned upon. Such appurtenances may be "artistic," but they are unhygienic. The folding bed is also inconsistent with the most healthful conditions for sleep, although much can be said in its favor on the ground of economy of space.

It should be borne in mind that lung troubles are not generated by breathing cold air, but by inhaling that which is warm, impure and stagnant. Consumption is essentially a house disease, and coughs and colds are cured rather than caused by cold air. For this reason do not hesitate to let full draughts of pure cold air into the sleeping-room. Frost is both a tonic and a microbe killer.

Closet and Altar

Prayer is a faithful messenger we send to the throne of God to call him to our aid in the time of need.

A man who is destitute knows how to pray. He needs not any instructor. His miseries indoctrinate him wonderfully into the art of offering prayer. Let us know ourselves destitute, that we may know how to pray; destitute of strength, of wisdom, of due influence, of true happiness, of proper faith, of thorough consecration, of the knowledge of the Scriptures, of righteousness.—George Bowen.

And I smiled to think God's greatness
Flowed around our incompleteness,
Round our restlessness his rest.
—Mrs. Browning.

The child of God is called to the blessed privilege of living every moment of his life in fellowship with God. He is called to enjoy the full light of his countenance. . . . He came not to dwell near us but to be in us, that we might be filled with his indwelling. That is the whole teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews—the veil is rent in twain; we have access into the holiest of all by the blood of Jesus; we come into the very presence of God so that we can live all the day with that presence resting upon us. —Andrew Murray.

By Christ's rule of life the divine ideal of "heaven every day" can be enjoyed by all the sorrowing children of men. It will come through a faith which reasons in this wise: The infinite Creator is my Heavenly Father. He sustains me at this moment and therefore I must be a part of his divine plan. Am I tried beyond measure? The apparent evil is a stepping-stone to some greater good. By simply accepting what my highest reason tells me must be true, by receiving the experience of this moment as the will of God, the veriest dross will be turned into fine gold, anxiety will be changed to joy. The heart will go out in love to every creature. The peace which passeth understanding will abide in the soul.—T. F. Seward.

I know not by what methods rare,
But this I know—God answers prayer.

I know that he has given his word
Which tells me prayer is always heard,

And will be answered, soon or late,
And so I pray and calmly wait;

. . . . . .

Assured that he will grant my quest,
Or send some answer far more blest.

O Lord, our everlasting and gracious Father, thou art ever ready to hear us when we call upon thee. We come to thee in all our weakness, with our sins and many transgressions, and thank thee that the blood of Jesus Christ thy Son cleanseth us from all sin. We thank thee for thy gracious help in times past, and pray that we may always feel thy loving presence, and that our hearts may be so full of Christ that there will not be room therein for any evil thought. We pray that thou wilt guard us from unseen dangers, and guide us in all times of temptation. Help us, we beseech thee, to be sons and daughters of the King. Help us that we may, day by day, live nearer to thee. We ask it for the love of Christ and in his name. Amen.

With a little "coaxing" our Tangle class was induced to find "many ways to sing." While two or three of the class found the effort somewhat "magnetizing," however, it was "agonizing" to others, and it was made quite "vexing" by some "wheezing" and a few incongruous attempts at "waltzing." Out of the discord a few tanglers brought harmony. Those from whom complete and correct lists were received within about twelve days were: A. G. S., Merrimacport, Mass.; Julia E. Sanford, Westfield, Mass.; Katherine C. Eastman, Nashua N. H.; R. M. F., Brookline, Mass.; H. H., Sherbrooke, Quebec; Mrs. G. E. Aiken, Newton, Mass.; Mrs. F. W. Bostwick, Medina, O.; Lottie Alice Wilson, Boscawen, N. H.; Old Fellow, Boston, Mass. Not more than two or three of the lists agree exactly in the words given, the best in all respects being clearly that of Old Fellow, Boston, Mass., to whom the prize book is awarded. In this list, as in several others, the nineteenth word is given as "pressing," which seems to fit better than the answer of the author.

Other solvers of 98 and other recent tangles are: E. J. Whiton, Waterbury, Ct., 98; Mrs. J. D. French, Braintree, Mass., 98; C. R. Hooker, Winter Park, Fla., 96, 97, 98; Frances E. Duane, Ogdensburg, N. Y., 98; Phineas Hubbard, Cambridge, Mass., 98; Mary E. Thomas, Forest Grove, Ore., 98; Salera P. Bartholomew, Bristol, Ct., 96, 97, 98; Mrs. F. E. Cotton, Woburn, Mass., 98; Miss W. F. Thomson, N. Wilbraham, Mass., 98; Margaret H. Rogers, Bar Harbor, Me., 98; Julia E. Sanford, Westfield, Mass., 95, 97; Katherine C. Eastman, Nashua, N. H., 96; one whose list bears neither name nor address, 98.

As the "Word Hunt" (108) offers a most interesting and instructive exercise, a prize of a fine fountain Pen—of gold and ebonite—will be given to the reader sending the best answer. If there should be a tie neatness will count among the merits. All solutions must reach this office as early as Dec. 15.

A convenient article to have in the kitchen is a medium-sized paper pad, with a lead pencil attached, on which the housewife can jot down articles to be purchased when she goes to market. The slip of paper is easily torn off, and one need not tax her memory to keep in mind all the articles that are needed. The pad can also be used for jotting down little jobs of work to be done that otherwise might be overlooked.

The Conversation Corner.

THERE are three things I wish to get into this Corner, if there is room. The first is a letter from our good missionary friend, Dr. Grenfell, of the Deep Sea Mission. Those of you who saw him in New England last winter will recognize him in the picture, with his noble dog under his arm and his stalwart crew around him. They look as though they were faithful helpers in the adventurous and perilous cruises of the Sir Donald among the rocks and icebergs of that wild coast.

RED BAY, LABRADOR.

My Dear Mr. Martin: . . . I am going to take Pomiuk to Battle Harbour for the winter, where Sister Williams will remain, so that he will have another long cruise in the Sir Donald. He is much the same, has neither gained nor lost since the summer began. But we doctors here consider it a hopeless case, and can only try to make the last year or two of his brief life happy and comfortable. Yet in God's infinite providence it has not been lived in vain. It has brought the help of your Corner to our work, and will thus indirectly in God's hands prove a boon to many a sick and injured one, I trust, after Pomiuk has passed into the presence of the King.

Please call him "Gabriel" when you write him. He does not like to retain the old name. He looks on the new name as part of his salvation and—as all Eskimo are taught on this coast—on his baptism as his beginning to rank as a redeemed person. I will write you about the Cot later. Battle Hospital is full and overflowing. Praise to God also for souls saved this summer! Altogether I may sign myself,

Yours in perfect happiness, health and affection for you,

WILFRED GRENFELL.

We are sorry to think that there is less hope of permanent recovery, but we are glad that in God's kind providence the poor boy is safe and happy in a Christian hospital, with everything done for his comfort and relief; and, above all, that he has learned to love and trust the Lord Jesus Christ. We are thankful that we have had the opportunity of keeping him in that "Corner Cot," and we will not cease to keep him there by our little gifts as long as he needs a cot or a home on the earth.

Now for the second thing. It is suggested by the first. There are thousands of children today in Turkey whose parents have been cruelly killed, and who are without home or clothes or food. They live close to our American missionaries, who know about their need and sufferings and can help them—if we in our prosperous and happy country will furnish the means. I have just read over the articles about it in The Congregationalist of Nov. 12 and 19. You will then see how much good our few mites can do for those poor, starving children:

$5 will house and clothe one orphan for one year. $10 will provide home, clothing and food for one orphan for five months, that is, till the winter is over.

Which share shall we take? We must take one! We Cornerers have kept the saddle-bags twins, Aram and Vahan, at an Armenian school for a year; we have kept O Sumi San and O Hana San in the Okayama Orphanage, I do not know how long; we are gladly keeping Pomiuk, the Eskimo orphan, in the Shore Hospital in Labrador; of course we must have a hand in this good work too! So put your hand in your pocket or in your "bank" and take out a nickle or a dime or a quarter or more, "as God has prospered you," and hand it to me to make up the "Corner share for the Armenian Orphans." Do it soon, do it before Dec. 25—it will be a beautiful Christmas gift to your little brothers and sisters in the ancient land of the Bible who are in such terrible trouble. The Lord of Christmas will love you all the more for doing this "In his name!"

My thirdly is about our Corner Party. We have really had two gatherings before in the name of the Corner—one a patriotic pilgrimage through "old Boston" in April, 1894, with Charles Carleton Coffin as our guide; the other during the great C. E. Convention in 1895 in Miss Dyer's room at Congregationalist headquarters, when Mr. Whittemore provided us with bonbons and lemonade. But these were not genuine children's parties like this one I am going to tell you of now.

This was for the children! It was held Saturday afternoon, Nov. 14, at the beautiful home of Mrs. Charles Carleton Coffin in Brookline. It was first planned before the sudden death of Mr. Coffin last spring, so that a pleasant memory of that good man was a kind of benediction on all our meeting. How he would have enjoyed it, for he loved youth and wrote largely for them. When some mention was made of his popular books, as The Boys of '76, Daughters of the Revolution, Life of Lincoln, Drumbeat of the Nation, Marching to Victory, Redeeming the Republic, Freedom Triumphant, one boy spoke up quickly, "I have just read Dan of Millbrook"—that is a new edition of one of his earliest books, a story of country life in New Hampshire, known then as "Caleb Kringle."

Some grown-up people were admitted by courtesy—like the new Brookline pastor whose picture was in The Congregationalist a few weeks ago, the Shawmut Church pastor, the Lady from the Library at the Congregational House, the Home and Literary Editors, etc. But they had to take back seats, while the real Cornerers filled the parlor. I cannot remember them all, but the oldest was doubtless the one with the antediluvian name—do you know her?—with Rose and Emily, Clara, Cornelia and Caro, and little Beth. If Marguerite and Marjorie count the same as Margaret, that was the banner name, with the Helens (including Eleanor) as a close second, and the Dorothys too. For boys, there was Winthrop, the Puritan governor, Bruce, the Scottish chieftain, Harold, the Saxon king, the two Ralphs, with such Scotch names as Robert and Donald, and English names, as Carleton, Charles, Sherwin and Thurlow.

All these names (perhaps others) I heard as Mr. Bridgman, the Managing Editor, who was master of ceremonies, called the roll and started the games. "Stage coach" came first, and what a hustling there was among the girls and boys when "it" called out "Boston"! Then we were taught the "Shailer Street sneeze," one division at a given signal shouting hish, another hash and the rest hosh—a sneeze which worked in well later when we wished to give three cheers for Mrs. Coffin and others! It was some time before all could repeat,

The moon is round like a cheese,
Has two eyes, a nose and a mouth, to suit the manager. The "electric shock" was given to three children who went out and, when we had fixed on some metallic object for them to touch, returned. When one of them chanced to touch that object, we all screamed hish, hash, hosh—and that was the shock! Do Cornerers remember Kit su ne ken, the Japanese game introduced to them Feb. 23, 1893? We played that in merry style, with a piano accompaniment to

Chon kina, chon kina,
Chon, chon, kina, kina,

although it was not always easy to tell quickly enough whether the fox, the man or the gun was the right sign to be made. We also "chose sides" and had a geography game and a brisk contest to see which of two divisions could pass down the lines and back, one by one, a basket of clothes pins. The best was saved to the last—an entertainment in sleight of hand, kindly contributed by two young physicians, who were introduced by Mr. B. as "leaving a seemingly large and lucrative practice" to amuse us children. They succeeded! They tore up a Japanese handkerchief and straightway mended it again with their "magic wand"; they drew a couple of live rabbits and lots of other things out of an empty box; they took eggs—four of them—out of the "other doctor's" mouth, cooking one in a silk hat; and to cap the climax took several rings from the children, pounded them up (apparently), put them into an old pistol, fired them into an old bottle, broke the bottle with a hammer and drew out a little live guinea pig, suspended to whose neck by a blue ribbon were the veritable rings, unharmed! This was so, for they put the guinea pig into my hands, and afterwards gave him to Bruce to take home. Sarah Noah said she knew how some of these wonders were done, and the keen-eyed boys in front looked very wise, but it was certainly a very fine performance, and we hish-hash-hoshed the prestidigitators heartily.

Then the children marched and countermarched into the dining-room, where they showed their sleight of hand in disposing of Mrs. Coffin's collation. I counted them and there were just twenty-six, the traditional Corner number! Another curious thing was that, although not so designed, the party was held on the anniversary of the starting of the Corner, ten years age. The old-style, large Congregationalist of Nov. 11, 1886, was shown with the first "Corner." [I omit an unimportant paragraph.—D. F.]

LESSON FOR DEC. 13. Prov. 23: 15-25.

CAUTIONS AGAINST INTEMPERANCE.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

There is enough good sense in this lesson to make a boy's fortune, if he will take it to himself. It points out noble living and its rewards. We will fix our thoughts on four counsels:

1. Listen to your parents' advice, for thus you will gladden their lives [vs. 15, 16, 22, 24, 25]. Don't forget that the heart is the whole being—affections, intellect, will. In this first verse the father says, "My son, if thou art honorable in all thy character, all my being will exult in thee." A letter lies before me. It was not written to me, but to another man. Incidentally, it refers to my son. It speaks of him as wholly devoted to a good work, and honors his usefulness. No compliment to myself would appeal to me as those words do. I am stronger to work because of them, and all my life is brighter. So sons and daughters give back life to those who gave them life. God is our father. From our own feelings we may understand his. He is our mother also. All the pride, the tenderness, the glad sense of possession felt by parents for their children are only faint reflections of the mind and heart of God. We cannot all wisely follow all the counsels of our parents. But the counsel of our Heavenly Father is always the same: "Buy the truth, and sell it not; yea, wisdom and instruction and understanding." That we can do. It is a life business, and our success in it is God's pride and joy. The highest privilege we have is to make God glad by holy living, and to be glad in him. No wonder the Westminster divines began their catechism by declaring, "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever."

2. Listen not to sinners, for there is reward for right doing [vs. 17-19]. Verse 17 means, Don't be hungry for what sinners enjoy, but be hungry all the time for what the Lord gives. Almost the same thought is illustrated by Paul's saying: "Be not drunken with wine, wherein is riot; but be filled with the Spirit." If you want to be drunk, to be licentious, to be rich through cheating your neighbors, you are as unworthy and mean as though your desires were satisfied. If you want to be in awe of God, you will see him. If your heart burns for sin, it will be consumed by and by. If your heart burns for God, he will fill you with his Spirit. "Surely there is an end." There is a reward, good or evil, which is an inevitable result of our ruling desires. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled." What do you want most? Let parents, let experience, let the Word of God teach you how to rule and kindle your desires. "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life."

3. Keep appetite in subjection, for when uncontrolled it destroys life [vs. 20, 21]. This is a specific illustration of the counsel just given. Don't let your appetites run away with your head and heart. If you do, your appetites will measure your worth. Who has not heard surprise expressed because there are so many attractive unmarried women, and so many wives whose husbands are unworthy of them? It takes only half an eye to see the reason. If men are scarce in social circles where good women resort, it is not because the male sex is in the minority. Walk along the city streets at night where barrooms are numerous, and look into the windows. Stand before the doors of theaters which respectable women avoid, about the time when the performance closes, and watch the crowds of men pour out. There are men enough—but look at their faces. What true, refined woman would want to live with one of these as his wife? Such men drag down with them their wives, if they have them. Winebibbers make drunkards; riotous flesh eaters make gluttons. Drunkenness and gluttony make poverty and rags. Of all base things the most repulsive is that poverty of soul of which rags are the appropriate sign. When fleshly appetite rules a man he is dead to all that makes manhood, and one of the strongest appetites, which easily grows beyond control, is the appetite for intoxicating drink. Drinking as a habit is dangerous. It may easily become vicious. If your manhood is precious to you, let liquor alone. There is no noble living without an appetite for God.

4. Know what is true and be true, for so you make glad those who love you [vs. 23-25]. Wisdom calls and pleads. "All the things that may be desired are not to be compared unto her." "Whoso findeth me findeth life," she says. "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding." Choose wisdom, then. Make the great decision now. If you have made it, renew it today. It needs to be often renewed; and the church services, the Sunday school, the social circle of believers are great boons to those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for all these are opportunities to repeat the great decision to serve God. In response to our resolve he fills us with himself, and the God-filled man or woman is the best and noblest of all his creations.

To get the truth and hold it is to be a blessing. It makes our parents glad and our friends. It makes God glad. It is the highest success realized. Seek God with all your heart and you shall be filled with his Spirit. You shall be able to crush every evil desire within you. You shall be lovable and beloved. You shall have influence over others and shall uplift them. You shall know the secret of God and shall have power with him. I pray that you may "know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that ye may be filled unto all the fullness of God."

THE OUTLOOK IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

The first snowstorm covered the entire northern half of the State to a depth of from six to fifteen inches, making country work in many places difficult. The State never has had so early a snow since the big three-day storm of Oct. 16, 1880. The fall commenced Oct. 29, and continued at intervals nearly every day for a time. Rough feed was plentiful, but being stacked on the prairie was inaccessible, and in consequence the price advanced. The deep fall of snow is considered favorable to good crops next year. The average yield of grain has been good, which, with rising prices, brings steady improvement in business interests. The shipments of stock from the State have been enormous, exceeding those of any recent year. No State is better prepared to take advantage of the generally advancing conditions of the whole country than is South Dakota. Newly projected lines of railway are proposed, connecting the western with the eastern portion of the State—a connection greatly needed for commercial, social and religious interests. The southern fever is giving way to more healthful contentment.

Congregational interests in every department were never more firmly planted. They have steadily strengthened, notwithstanding the hard years. Nowhere have pastors been more loyal. The full rewards do not yet appear. German Congregational work has made conservative yet marked progress, thanks to the united efforts of the C. S. S. and P. S. and the C. H. M. S. Yankton College, with Pres. H. K. Warren and a strong corps of professors, is steadily gaining, as evidenced by the increased number of advanced students. Redfield College is laboring with undaunted courage in the erection of a new building, already approaching completion. The trustees of this institution are to be commended for their "pay as you go" plan. Workmen are remunerated in full each week, and the work then stops until sufficient money is in sight to allow for resuming it.

What the Reading Public This Year Owes to Authors and Publishers.

THE BOOKS OF 1896.

It is a surprise that the financial stress of the past year has made so small an impression in the field of literature. The number of publications issued by the chief houses of this country appears to be even larger than last year and if the number of elaborate and exceptionally costly publications be smaller than usual, there is little, if any, diminution in the number of important works. Moreover, the resources of mechanics and art have been drawn upon as freely as ever to secure charming as well as substantial results. In accordance with our custom at this season we indicate this week some of the more notable books in which our readers may be assumed to have special interest.

If we first consider books Religious or Theological, it is, perhaps, The Mind of the Master [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50], by Rev. John Watson, D. D., "Ian Maclaren," which occurs at once to recollection. Illustrating his mature thought and remarkable power of lucid expression, it sets forth his understanding of Christ's utterances in regard to the great themes of Christianity—faith, immortality, sin, suffering, etc. It is not a treatise on systematic theology but an attempt to interpret our Lord more intelligibly to waiting souls. It is full of fresh and intelligent spiritual sympathy and not without touches of the humor which has helped to make his novels so delightful. With this one thinks naturally of Dr. Henry Van Dyke's The Gospel for an Age of Doubt [Macmillan Co. $1.75], as learned and even profound as it is sympathetic and timely. Weightier in some respects and deriving a certain importance from the writer's official position, is Moral Evolution [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $2.00] by Prof. George Harris, D. D., of Andover. It urges that self-preservation and self-development are vital to human progress toward the divine ideal. Accepting the doctrine of evolution, the author seeks to find in it the interpretation of the moral and spiritual development of mankind. The book marks a radical change from the theology of the famous seminary creed, but is a powerful contribution to the solution of some modern theological problems. In this connection may be noticed Evolution and Dogma [McBride & Co. $2.00] by Rev. J. A. Zahm of the University of Notre Dame. It is specially significant in that it is a study of evolution from the Roman Catholic point of view. It indicates that modern scientific conclusions may be accepted in the Roman Catholic Church to a greater degree than many have supposed.

Another suggestive work is Agnosticism and Religion [Scribners. $1.00] by Professor Schurman of Cornell; a scientific endeavor to show the validity of Christian thought as contrasted with materialistic science. It is a valuable book for young men puzzled by the alleged uncertainties of the religious teaching of our day. Man's origin and development through conformity to environment also is the theme of The Whence and Whither of Man [Scribners. $1.75], in which are issued Prof. J. M. Tyler's Morse lectures of 1895 before the Union Theological Seminary. It embodies an able and Christian interpretation of the evolutionary theory without conceding Weissman's limitations, and ranks with important productions on this topic. Dr. A. H. Bradford's Heredity and Christian Problems [Macmillans. $1.50], which came out late last year, is a keen study of heredity and environment in their bearings upon Christ and his service. Prof. J. A. Beet's The New Life in Christ [Eaton & Mains. 75 cents] also makes deep and abiding spiritual impressions after the manner of the old-fashioned Methodism.

Rev. Frederic Palmer's Studies in Theological Definition [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25] discusses some vital doctrines of the gospel and interprets profound truth in terms for plain people, suggesting vividly the organic relation of God through the church to humanity, and perhaps putting more emphasis thereon than many readers will concede. Canon Gore's Dissertations on Subjects Connected with the Incarnation [Scribners. $2.50] supplements the famous Bampton Lectures of 1891 and, in defending the doctrine of the virgin birth of our Lord and opposing the theory of transubstantiation and otherwise, does good service against materialism and the extreme claims of the Romanizing wing of the Anglican Church. Professor Salmond of the Free Church College of Aberdeen, in his Christian Doctrine of Immortality [Scribners. $5.00], has made an important contribution to the comprehension of the Scriptures. He combats the doctrine of conditional immortality, sees no Scriptural ground for restorationism, opposes millennianism and rejects the doctrine of an intermediate state. So much is said at present referring to Buddhism that such a book as Prof. T. W. R. Davids's Buddhism [Putnams. $1.50], the first series of the American Lectures on Religion, deserves mention. It is a clear account of the greatest system of pantheistic philosophy which the world has known and therefore timely and worth study.

Dr. E. W. Donald's Lowell Lectures, The Expansion of Religion [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], also deserve note. Prepared from the point of view of a working clergyman, they are characterized by a discrimination and a spirit of optimism which justify their popularity and will insure their permanent usefulness. Prof. William James's philosophical and essentially Christian answer to the question, Is Life Worth Living? [S. B. Weston. 50 cents] has had a wide and well-merited reception. Moreover, although we have not yet been able to review it, we call attention to Dr. Samuel Harris's great work, God, the Creator and Lord of All [Scribners. $5.00], which has just been published. We should mention also a somewhat unique book, The Diary of a Japanese Convert [Revell. $1.00], by Kanzao Uchimuro. A record of practical experience, it is a striking portrayal of intellectual change followed by spiritual development, and its simplicity renders it the more enjoyable.

Taking up Biblical History and Criticism, we note first the important History of the Warfare of Science and Theology in Christendom [Appletons. $5.00], in which ex-Pres. A. D. White has embodied his exhaustive studies. He concludes that dogmatic theology uniformly has opposed the advance of science and always has been obliged to yield because it had gone beyond its proper field. Much of his contention in this respect must be conceded, but he has no purpose antagonistic to Christianity which, in spite of its faults, he shows to have been a powerfully controlling element in human life. His work is of great importance, whether one agrees or disagrees with his conclusions. Less elaborate but equally scholarly is the volume of Prof. A. C. Zenos, Elements of the Higher Criticism [Funk & Wagnalls. $1.00], an acute examination of the legitimacy, purpose, method and history of the higher criticism. Prof. G. P. Fisher's History of Christian Doctrine [Scribners. $2 50] is up to date as a summary of philosophical and theological development and is at once comprehesive, thorough and judicially candid. The supplementary volume of The Ante-Nicene Fathers [Christian Literature Co. $4.00], edited by Prof. Allan Menzies, which includes the Gospel of Peter, the Diatessaron of Tatian, etc., is of the first importance to Biblical scholars.

Sir J. W. Dawson in Eden Lost and Won [Revell Co. $1.25] has added another important contribution to the list of Biblical interpretations. His archæological knowledge gives special weight to his judgments. It is noteworthy that he wholly abandons the theory of the universality of the deluge, and he discusses this and all such topics with a calmness and fullness which promote confidence in his conclusions.

Dr. H. C. Trumbull is remarkably prolific in books of importance. One more of his, The Threshold Covenant [Scribners. $2.00], discusses the beginnings of religious rites. The threshold, he holds, was the first altar. The sacrifices there made were signs and seals of a covenant between those within the house and those without. From this modern forms of worship and observance have been developed and also, by mistaken direction, the idolatrous religions of the old world have grown. The interest and suggestiveness of such a treatise is apparent and his interpretation of the significance of the Passover is especially striking. The second volume of History, Prophecy and the Monuments [Macmillan Co. $3.00], by Prof. J. F. McCurdy, also has come out. It continues the story of Israel to the fall of Nineveh, showing how the history of the leading nations of the ancient Oriental world illustrates the career and the downfall of Israel. It points out how the Hebrews alone, of all the Semitic peoples, realized the true idea of a nation.

The lectures of Professor Scott of Chicago Seminary at Princeton on The Origin and Development of the Nicene Theory [Chicago Seminary Press. $1.50] deal with topics much in discussion at present, controvert the teaching of Ritschl and his school, confute the theory that doctrines reflect only practical relations of the gospel and not necessarily objective realities, dispute also the position that the gospel miracles are unnecessary to Christian faith, and ably oppose rashness in accepting interpretations of Christian truth. Their positive teaching of course is able, also. The ninth and tenth volumes of Renan's History of Israel [Roberts Bros. $2.50] complete one of the late author's great works. He believed Christianity to be an evolution from Judaism and itself only a step in the way to some new religion, probably scientific, rational and without revelation. His discussion of the subject is eminently readable, although far from convincing. Quite by itself and intensely interesting stands Prof. Richard Moulton's Literary Study of the Bible [Heath & Co. $1 00]. Apparently intended for students of English literature in higher institutions of learning, it avoids the direct discussion of problems of the higher criticism and theology, and demonstrates afresh and powerfully the superiority of the Bible over all other literature.

Turning to Devotional Literature, we commend Rev. Floyd Tomkins's The Christian Life [Dutton. 75 cents] as eminently wise and stimulating; Dean Farrar's admirably practical The Paths of Duty [Crowell. 35 cents]; Rev. F. B. Meyer's David, Shepherd, Psalmist, King [Revell. $1.00], which accepts the traditional view of the authorship of the Psalms and uses them as expressing the external and internal history of the king; and the same writer's Light on Life's Duties [Revell. 50 cents], which is sympathetic and helpful; Dr. J. F. Miller's Things to Live For [Crowell. $1.00], which touches life at many points; Rev. Andrew Murray's The Master's Indwelling and The Deeper Christian Life [Revell. 75 cents and 50 cents]; Dodd, Mead & Co.'s series of Little Books on Religion, in which appeared Dr. W. R. Nicoll's Seven Words from the Cross, Dr. John Watson's The Upper Room and the late Dr. R. W. Dale's Christ and the Future Life [Each 50 cents]; Dr. H. C. Trumbull's thoughtful and stimulating treatise on Prayer [Wattles. 75 cents] is as inspiring as it is profound, and the same author's sympathetic and comforting book, In Tribulation [Wattles. 75 cents], is very helpful.

Volumes of notable Sermons have been few. Among the best are Dr. F. A. Noble's The Divine Life in Man and Other Sermons [Revell], in which the central themes of the gospel are discussed with wise comprehension of human needs; Dr. P. H. Moxom's The Religion of Hope [Roberts Brothers. $1.25], which is full of inspiring Christian optimism; and the volume of discourses delivered in college chapels by Rt. Rev. William Lawrence of Massachusetts and entitled Visions of Service [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25], which discusses problems of faith and doubt for the benefit of thoughtful minds. The late Dr. J. P. Coyle's Rand lectures at Iowa College, entitled The Spirit in Literature and Life [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], in which intellectual breadth and spiritual alertness and earnestness are conspicuous, form an honorable memorial of its author. In Dr. Alexander Maclaren's The Beatitudes [Macmillans. $1.50] the author's richness of spiritual experience imparts power to a style of the utmost simplicity; The Great Charter of Christ [Whittaker. $1.50], by Rt. Rev. W. B. Carpenter, the Bishop of Ripon, a series of fresh and forcible studies of the Sermon on the Mount; and The Epistle of James and Other Discourses [Armstrong. $1.50], by the late Dr. R. W. Dale, a characteristically living and stirring exposition of the most practical of the epistles, must not be overlooked.

Two or three additional religious books ought to be mentioned at this point. One is Baptism as Taught by the Master [Cong. Pub. Soc. 50 cents], an acute and candid study by Prof. R. R. Lloyd, D. D.; and another is The Council Manual [Cong. Pub. Soc. 10 cents], which needs no comment. It already is finding acceptance.

A pleasant connecting link, so to speak, between the foregoing and the department of Secular History is Dr. E. H. Byington's The Puritan in England and New England [Roberts Bros. $2.00], one of the most delightful productions of the year. We need only name it now. With it may be mentioned Rev. J. Gregory's Puritanism in the Old World and in the New [Revell. $2.00], written from an English point of view and a sympathetic and commendable addition to the literature of the subject. Prof. Albert Weber's History of Philosophy [Scribners. $2.50], translated by Prof. Frank Thilly, is a comprehensive, concise and uncommonly serviceable work. Prof. Kuno Francke's Social Forces in German Literature [Holt. $2.00] is an able philosophical study in the history of civilization. Mr. G. T. Curtis's Constitutional History of the United States [Harpers. $3.00] is completed by the second volume, in which the author's strong prejudices are apparent but do not invalidate the worth of the treatise. The fourth volume of Hon. Theodore Roosevelt's The Winning of the West [Putnams. $2 50] gives the story of Louisiana and the Northwest from 1791 to 1807. He pays a deserved tribute to the services of home missionaries in leading the development of the West.

Rev. S. D. Peet's book on The Moundbuilders [Chicago American Antiquarian. $3.50] is a unique and striking contribution to archæological history. He rejects the identity of the Moundbuilders and Cliff-dwellers with the Indians, and he does not attribute to the first-named as high a degree of civilization as do many. The Empire of the Tsars and the Russians [Putnams. $3.00], by Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu, the third volume of which has appeared, is a fascinating although somewhat strange picture of mediæval conditions influenced by modern thoughts and tendencies. The influence of the author's nationality is apparent at times, but does not impair seriously the value of the book. Mr. H. C. Lea's History of Confession and Indulgence in the Latin Church [Lea Bros. & Co. $9.00] is a tremendous arraignment of the Roman Catholic system of governing the world through the confessional. It is conscientious in investigation, impartial in statement and worthy of the author's high reputation as a historian. The fourth volume of the late Prof. Herbert Tuttle's History of Prussia [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50] also is a fine piece of work, and so is Prof. George Saintsbury's History of Nineteenth Century Literature [Macmillan Co. $1.50], which is sparkling as well as substantial. Two superior reprints also have been Houghton & Mifflin's beautifully illustrated new edition of John Fiske's History of the American Revolution [$8.00], and Messrs. Crowell & Co.'s substantial and tasteful edition of Victor Duruy's History of France [$3.00].

The list of Biographies and Autobiographies is no briefer this year than usual. Mrs. (Phelps) Ward's Chapters from a Life [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], relating much of her own history and affording fine pictures of life in old Andover, Gloucester and elsewhere, is thoroughly delightful. To most of our readers the Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $4.00], by J. T. Morse, Jr., must be of primary interest. The biographer had a subject peculiarly susceptible of successful treatment and he has made a biography which it is not easy to lay aside. The Life and Letters of Charles Bulfinch, the Architect [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $5 00], edited by his granddaughter, Ellen S. Bulfinch, is of particular interest to Massachusetts readers because of the recent proposition to alter the State House in Boston, which is one of his chief architectural monuments. Governor Hutchinson [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $4.00], of colonial fame, is the theme of a new work by J. K. Hosmer, the historian. Perhaps he has failed to maintain sufficient impartiality, but his book is a helpful study of the man and the times.

The life of Elias Boudinot, LL. D., [Houghton, Mifflin & Co, $6.00], edited by J. J. Boudinot, is elaborate and elegant and the high character and distinguished services of its subject, who was president of the Continental Congress, abundantly insure it a welcome. It contains many of the most valuable documents of the Revolutionary literature. Eminent in a different way, but also highly honored, was Peter Parker [Cong. Pub. Soc. $1.50], the missionary, physician and diplomatist, whose career in China, as romantic as useful, has been narrated by Prof. G. B. Stevens and Dr. W. F. Marwick. It is one of the biographies which are specially and lastingly inspiring. So is the Life of Cyrus W. Field [Harpers. $2.00], described by Isabel F. Judson. The Atlantic telegraph is not the only immense undertaking successfully carried to its issue by this distinguished American and his life story is well told.

The Life and Letters of Maria Mitchell [Lee & Shepard. $2.00], by Phebe M. Kendall, presents a distinct and striking picture of the career of this eminent scientist, one of the first of modern women to attain high distinction as well as one of the most womanly of women. Her history always must be a favorite with girl readers. Professor Sloan's Life of James McCosh [Scribners. $2 50] describes ably the great metaphysician, whose presidency at Princeton College always must remain an important period in its history. Equally notable, but as a simple preacher and pastor, was the late Dr. A. J. Gordon [Revell. $1.50], the eminent Baptist, whose services to the church and humanity are set forth in a biography carefully written by his son.

Among similar volumes dealing with eminent foreigners may be mentioned Matthew Arnold's Letters [Macmillan Co. $3.00], edited by G. W. Russell, which exhibits much of the charm of the man, but which may subtract something from the exalted estimate of him which many have held. A very similar volume, The Letters and Verses of Arthur Penrhyn Stanley [Scribners. $5.00], edited by Mr. R. E. Prothero, is a delightful supplement to the life of Stanley and adds much to the large and manifold interest of his career. The Life and Adventures of George Augustus Sala [Scribners. $3.00] also is an entertaining story of diversified struggle and success. Mr. Sala was one of the most picturesque characters in English literary life for many years, and his account of his career is well worth reading. Constant's Private Life of Napoleon [Scribners. $5.00] is another noteworthy biographical work. It is a reprint, of course, but for many years it has been disregarded. It presents an intimate view of Napoleon's life and is a peculiarly valuable addition to the accounts of the great emperor. The third and fourth volumes of the Memoirs of Barras [Harpers. $7.50] complete one of the most conceited and prejudiced, yet most significant, of the many works relating to the same period in history.

Joan of Arc is the subject of three recent volumes. One [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $2.00], by Hon. F. C. Lowell, contains his Lowell Lectures, paying especial attention to the contest between supernaturalism and materialism. The second, Jeanne D'Arc, Her Life and Death [Putnams. $1.50], is by Mrs. Oliphant. It is written for the Heroes of the Nations series. The third is Joan of Arc [Harpers. $2.50], by Mark Twain, which is remarkable for its clear analysis of her work and character.

No Poems of immortal excellence seem to have risen above the horizon recently, but some very good verse has appeared. Richard Burton's Dumb in June [Copeland & Day. 75 cents] reveals his exceptionally keen perception of the inner meanings of the natural world and his conspicuous ability as an artist in verse. Songs of Day and Night [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1 50] makes pleasant revelation of a less familiar yet characteristic and admirable aspect of the versatility of Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus. Zitella Cocke in A Doric Reed [Copeland & Day. 75 cents] maintains a high level of sentiment and execution throughout and shows special mastery in the writing of sonnets. Clinton Scollard's Hills of Song [Copeland & Day. $1.25] also illustrates good literary work inspired by a hopeful and ennobling mood. The Pilgrim and Other Poems [Macmillan Co. $1.25], by Sophie Jewett (Ellen Burroughs), contains serious work of a lofty quality and not only indicates unusual present power but is full of future promise. A Quiet Road [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25], by Lizette W. Reese, is a modest book, but takes one so close to the heart of nature that it must be a favorite. Robert Louis Stevenson's Poems and Ballads [Scribners. $1.50] is partly new and contains all his previously published poems. It needs no characterization.

In The Purple East [Stone & Kimball. 75 cents] Mr. William Watson rises to a hight of moral earnestness which commends him to thoughtful readers and the book exhibits him at his best. Austin Dobson's fancy controls his own work more often than any profounder motive power, but his Story of Rosina and Other Verses [Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.00] is so bright and entertaining that the volume at once becomes a favorite. The late Matthew Arnold's Lyrical Poetry of the Bible [Macmillan Co. $1.00] also deserves mention as setting forth the distinguished author's judgment of the literary value of the Bible. The late Christina Rossetti's New Poems [Macmillan Co. $1.75] possess interest because of their authorship.

We point out now the more conspicuous Novels of the year. Beyond much question the first of them is Quo Vadis [Little, Brown & Co. $2.00], by the Polish author, Henryk Sienkiewicz. This is a powerful delineation of the Rome of Nero's time, its luxury and profligacy and the suffering and heroism of the earlier Christians. It is at once learned and brilliant. Another also is easily selected. It is Mrs. Humphry Ward's Sir George Tressady [Macmillan Co. $2.00]. It is more truly a novel than either of her earlier writings, but is also a keen and fascinating study of English social and political life. Our detailed comments upon it are so recent that we need not dwell upon it now. Mr. S. R. Crockett's The Gray Man [Harpers. $1.50] likewise is a strong book, conspicuous for painful as well as delightful features, but masterly in its portrayals of character and historic events. A peculiar story—having one chapter which we regret, but in the main exceptionally noble in sentiment and vivid and even eloquent in style—is Without Sin [H. S. Stone & Co.], by Martin J. Pritchard. Without being as minute a study of modern Jewish life as the novels of Mr. Zangwill, for example, it is a carefully drawn picture, and its bold and original yet reverent plot renders it a story not easily forgotten.

The late Robert Louis Stevenson's Weir of Hermistoun [Century Co. $1.50] is but a fragment, but what a fragment! It illustrates the author's diversified and pre-eminent ability quite as well as anything else in the list of his many writings. The Seats of the Mighty [Appletons. $1.50] is by Gilbert Parker. It is a historical novel, bold in conception, brilliant in execution, and worthy of his reputation. Mr. Barrie's Sentimental Tommy [Scribners. $1.50] also is exceedingly realistic and touching. A grave defect here or there does not destroy its conspicuousness among recent stories. Mr. Crawford's Taquisara [Macmillan Co. $2.00] is one of his most penetrating and spirited studies of Italian society.

The demand for Short Stories also has called out a number of volumes. Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch's Wandering Heath [Scribners. $1.25], which leads the reader from Cornwall to the Rocky Mountains adroitly; Jane Barlow's Strangers at Lisconnel [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], in which the author again makes the Irish peasantry vividly real to every reader; Sarah W. Brooks's My Fire Opal and Other Stories [Estes & Lauriat. $1.00], drawn out of her experiences as a prison visitor; G. W. Edwards's Break o' Day and Other Stories [Century Co. $1.00], interpreting faithfully fishing life along the Maine coast; Will Carleton's The Old Infant and Similar Stories [Harpers. $1.25], which are capital character studies; the late H. C. Bunner's Love in Old Cloathes [Scribners. $1.50], a pleasant memento of this popular author; and Mr. Thomas Nelson Page's In Old Virginia [Scribners. $2.50], in which several of his most famous sketches are reissued agreeably.

The boys and girls have received as much attention this year as ever and the list of excellent Juvenile books is too long to be fully enumerated. W. J. Rolfe's Shakespeare, the Boy [Harpers. $1.25] will introduce young readers to the works of the great poet while it also interests them for the time being. Mr. E. S. Brooks's Century Book of Famous Americans [Century Co. $1.50] also is wholesome, instructive and invitingly illustrated. Three Young Continentals [Wilde & Co. $1.50], by E. T. Tomlinson, and Three Little Daughters of the Revolution [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 75 cents], by Nora Perry, portrays some bright Revolutionary boys and girls. Above the Range [Wilde & Co. $1.25], by Theodora R. Jenness, depicts Indian girls in a Government school, and is capital. The Rockanock Stage [Cong. S. S. & Pub. Soc. $1.50], by Prof. George Huntington, is exciting and elevating. Malvern [Wilde & Co. $1.50] was largely suggested by the World's Fair. As Queer as She Could Be [Pres. Board of Pub. & S. S. Work. $1 25], by Jessie E. Wright, is more striking than most Sunday school books.

Sinbad, Smith & Co [Century Co. $1.50], by Albert Stearns, and The Sword Maker's Son [Century Co. $1.50], by W. O. Stoddard, already are well known and have taken a high place with the readers of St. Nicholas. Mr. Henty's productions, At Agincourt, On the Irrawaddy, and Cochrane the Dauntless [Scribners. Each $1.50], are full of thrilling experiences and inculcate manliness. So does David Ker's Swept Out to Sea [Lippincott Co. $1 50], and Col. T. W. Knox's The Land of the Kangaroo [Wilde & Co. $1.50] is another bracing book.

Half a Dozen Girls [Crowell. $1.50], by Anna C. Ray, deserves high praise. Annie F. Johnston in The Little Colonel [Joseph Knight. 50 cents] has depicted a charming heroine in a sweet and touching fashion, and Alice Aspinwall's Short Stories for Short People [Dutton. $1.50] also will be a favorite. Tommy-Anne and the Three Hearts [Macmillan Co. $1.50], by Mabel O. Wright, is half a fairy story, and Q.'s Fairy Tales Far and Near [Stokes Co. $1.50] is wholly so, and which is the more enticing is hard to be decided. Moreover, the Century Co., in issuing A Shadow Show [$1.00], by P. S. Newell, and Gobolinks [$1.00], by Ruth McE. Stuart and A. B. Paine, has contributed not a little to the amusement of both young and old.

Among Works of Travel and Adventure, the Ounananiche and Its Canadian Environment [Harpers. $2.00], by E. T. D. Chambers, is a beautiful example of the sort of book which many others than sportsmen and travelers appreciate highly. Camping in the Canadian Rockies [Putnams. $4.00], by W. D. Willcox, is another sumptuous volume, richly illustrated, about a comparatively unknown region of our country. Prof. G. F. Wright's Voyage in the Miranda [Appletons. $2.00] two years ago describes the Greenland icefields and life in the north Atlantic.

Mrs. Julia C. R. Dorr's A Cathedral Pilgrimage [Macmillan. 50 cents] is actually fascinating. Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton's Lazy Tours in Spain and Elsewhere [Roberts Bros. $1.50] is pleasant, and Mr. H. C. Chatfield-Taylor's The Land of the Castanet [H. S. Stone & Co. $1.25] describes similar experiences with more detail. Neither, however, is the peer of Edmondo de Amicis's classic, Spain and the Spaniards [$5.00], of which Messrs. H. T. Coates & Co. issued last winter a superb holiday edition. Kokoro, Hints and Echoes of Japanese Inner Life [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25], is another study by Lafcadio Hearn. The author is not the most well-balanced critic, but his book has value and, like everything from his pen, is exquisitely graceful in form. Alfred Parsons's Notes on Japan [Harpers. $3.00] also is a treasure, in respect to both text and illustrations.

A Cycle of Cathay [Revell. $2.00], by ex-President W. A. P. Martin, describes China, and is the fruit of long and intimate acquaintance with the country. It is more than ordinarily rewarding. Throughout his In the South Seas [Scribners. $1.50] R. L. Stevenson introduces the reader to an intimate acquaintance with the enticing landscapes and the diversified individualities of the region visited. One of the leading works of the year is Mr. W. E. Curtis's The Yankees of the East [Stone & Kimball. $4 00], a series of social, commercial, political and other studies of Japan, and another is one of the Harpers' last winter's issues, Mr. E. L. Weeks's graphic and beautiful From the Black Sea to Persia and India [$3.50].

A few volumes of Essays call for notice. Dr. H. W. Mabie's Essays on Nature and Culture [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25] is a penetrating and reverent study of nature and human nature and a stimulating interpretation of what is best in them. Another volume of serious and practical purpose is E. L. Godkin's Problems of Modern Democracy [Scribners. $2.00], which deals trenchantly with current themes of the first importance. Most of the "open-air" books belong here, such as Florence A. Merriam's Southern Californian breezy sketches, A-Birding on a Broncho [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25]; R. E. Robinson's charming In New England Fields and Woods [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25], a series of fine papers reprinted from Forest and Stream; Spring Notes from Tennessee [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25], observations by Bradford Torrey; and Bird Land Echoes [Lippincott Co. $2.00] by Dr. C. C. Abbott, who reveals the very heart of nature to the sympathetic reader. Some of the most serious and valuable work ever done by the late Eugene Field is found in his Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac [Scribners. $1.25] which, without lacking his characteristic humor, is wise and suggestive in graver directions.

Perhaps the most important book of the year in this vein is Miscellaneous Studies [Macmillan Co. $1.75] by the late Walter Pater. It contains what remains of his uncollected works edited by C. A. Shadwell, covers the whole period of his literary activity, indicates the development of his literary thought and style and speaks with deliberate care not only to the present but to the future. Less weighty, yet enjoyable and profitable for meditation, are Mr. Quiller-Couch's trenchant and sparkling Adventures in Criticism [Scribners. $1.50]; Edmund Gosse's Critical Kit-Kats [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25], soberer but also profounder; Mr. J. E. Chamberlin's two breezy volumes, The Listener in the Town and in the Country [Copeland & Day. Each 75 cents]; and Mrs. Sangster's inspiriting With My Neighbors [Harpers. $1.25].

Several volumes in the department of Social and Political Economy must be noted. One is Prof. A. T. Hadley's Economics [Putnams. $2.50] as practical as scholarly and dealing effectively with a multitude of important current topics. In his History of Money and Prices [Putnams. $1.50] Mr. J. Schoenhof also has made a valuable contribution to current knowledge and discussion. It is peculiarly timely. The dispassionateness and expert knowledge of Pres. F. H. Walker render his book on International Bimetallism [Holt. $1.25] important, whether one accepts his conclusions or not. Prof. John Bascom's Social Theory [Crowell. $1.75] will serve as a worthy text-book and reference work. From the same publishers has come W. M. Salter's Anarchy or Government [75 cents] which pleads for a degree of nationalization. Proportional Representation [Crowell & Co. $1.25] is the subject of Prof. J. R. Commons in a work proposing important modifications of our electoral system. Criminal Sociology [Appletons. $1.50], by Henrico Ferri, is a foreign contribution to the literature of penology. Another notable book is Classes and Masses [Macmillan Co. $1.25], by W. H. Mallock, who makes an able claim in behalf of the present constitution of society as against the Socialists.

A number of Miscellaneous volumes, as usual, remain. Dr. G. Birkbeck Hill's Talks About Autographs [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $3.50] is one, and is as comprehensive and interesting a work in its way as we have seen in a long time. Mr. C. H. Haswell's Reminiscences of an Octogenarian in the City of New York [Harpers. $3.00] possesses large antiquarian interest. Professor Young's revised volume of The Sun [Appletons. $2.00] illustrates the rapid progress of scientific knowledge, and Mr. Percival Lowell's Mars [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $2.50] embodies the results of long and expert study. Probably no other equally learned and also popular an account of that planet has been made.

The first volume of Books and Their Makers During the Middle Ages [Putnams. $2.50], by G. H. Putnam, is an elegant production, full of special learning and of large and lasting value. From the same publishers and the same author also has come a revised edition of the Question of Copyright [$1.75], a summary of the copyright laws now enforced by the leading nations. Mr. F. J. Stimson's Handbook to the Labor Laws of the United States [Scribners. $1.50], a manual for laymen rather than lawyers, is of great significance. Dr. W. H. Roberts also has rendered important service by compiling a volume of the Laws Relating to Religious Corporations [Pres. Board of Pub. and S. S. Work. $3.00], a full handbook of the statutes in the different States and Territories bearing upon churches and religious societies. Lieut. A. M. Rohan and Prof. M. M. Ramsey have gathered a large amount of diversified information of present importance into their volume, The Island of Cuba [Holt & Co. $1.25]; and Rev. E. M. Bliss's Turkey and the Armenian Atrocities [Hubbard Pub. Co. $1.50] and Mr. W. W. Howard's Horrors of Armenia [Armenian Relief Association. 10 cents] have discussed the Armenian situation with intelligence and earnestness.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE GOSPEL FOR AN AGE OF DOUBT.

We rank Dr. Henry van Dyke's latest volume, thus entitled, high among the pre-eminent contributions of the year to religious and theological thought. Reminding one in its fundamental positions of Ian Maclaren's The Mind of the Master, it is in some respects a more effective volume because its somewhat more careful discriminations will arouse less dissent and antagonism. It represents, with some little expansion, his lectures at Yale Divinity School last spring, and, regarded from the point of view of the audience to which he originally spoke, it steps at once to its proper place in the lengthening series of valuable and influential books that are the fruit of the Lyman Beecher Lectureship. But, helpful as The Gospel for an Age of Doubt must be to preachers, it also carries a message for every thoughtful, reverent mind perplexed with the problems of the day.

Its central aim is to show the fitness to our times of the gospel of a person and of the threefold message of liberty, sovereignty and service which Christ brought. Its diagnosis of the doubt, the materialism and all the skeptical and irreligious forces of the age is masterly. Not less admirable is the careful, patient working out of the argument for the supreme divinity of Christ and of the unveiling through him of the Father. To any one in perplexity over this cardinal doctrine of the faith, Dr. van Dyke's treatment of it, sympathetic as he is with all the issues raised by science and philosophy, must bring enlightenment and relief.

He does not, it is true, make use of all the arguments advanced by the long line of apologists before him, but his logic will be to the modern mind quite as convincing. Perhaps the profoundest chapter in the book is the fourth, that on the Human Life of God, but even through these unsounded depths of Christian thinking the reader does not lose his pilot's hand. Dr. van Dyke has drawn from many sources, ancient and modern, for illustration and confirmation of his positions. Indeed the book for popular effectiveness bears too many evidences of the student's desk. The long appendix, which considerably increases the bulk of the volume, detracts a little from its distinctive identity, although we remember the fondness of a limited class of readers for citations. At the same time Dr. van Dyke has put the stamp of his own vigorous and penetrating mind upon the material with which he has assimilated and has added thereto his personal contributions, for which the reader is most grateful. The literary and artistic perfectness of the book will not escape the attention even of those who are most impressed with its ample learning, the march of its logic and its superb setting forth of what the gospel of Christ really is and ought to do for modern life. [Macmillan Co. $1.75.]

THE YANKEES OF THE EAST.

This excellent work embodies in its two pretty volumes the letters contributed to the Chicago Record by the author, Mr. W. E. Curtis, during nearly seven months of 1895 as its special correspondent in Japan. An old traveler and journalist, he knew both what to see and how to describe it, and his letters attracted wide notice. Their republication in this permanent form is in response to a natural demand. In spite of occasional minor repetitions, they illustrate a superior quality of workmanship. They are remarkably comprehensive, minute, well balanced and graphic. Public matters and private, national customs and local peculiarities, underlying principles of government and obstacles to religious progress, matters of costume, diet, etiquette, agriculture, education, the drama, politics, etc., all are reported upon with the same masterly judgment and skill.

The business man must be convinced as he reads that a large field is open in Japan for the successful entry of American goods, if only sufficient and properly intelligent enterprise be displayed. It is as pleasant to read of the special favor in which Americans are held in Japan as it is humbling to realize how negligent we have been hitherto to use our opportunities there. The student of political economy will thank Mr. Curtis for lucid statements of the political history of Japan and of her present condition and future outlook. The chapter on the country's educational system is of deep interest, and not to educators and students alone, and the study of Buddhism here offered is a useful contribution to the knowledge of the great leading religions of the world.

That portion of the work which deals with missions and their results in the country is of special interest to our readers. The author devotes a chapter to this topic and reverts to it more than once elsewhere. He has taken pains to inform himself and is fair and courteous. He aims rather to depict the existing situation and the opinions which are held regarding it rather than to enforce or even to state any position of his own. He appreciates both the desire, so prevalent among many of the native Christians, to see a national church grow up, and also the difficulties in the way, the probabilities of difference between it and the existing churches, the rights of the American and other missionaries, etc., and he bears strong testimony to the efficiency of missionary work, although he is by no means a blind admirer of it. He thinks that, if either were to be removed, Japan could spare the missionary preachers rather than the missionary teachers.

His two volumes are illustrated handsomely and the reader feels heartily grateful for such an instructive and enjoyable a work. [Stone & Kimball. $4.00.]

RELIGIOUS.

It is occasionally asserted that the modern type of piety is less devotional than that of our fathers, but the abundance of devotional literature, which would hardly be bought except to be read, is a strong argument to the contrary. One of the richest and most suggestive of recent publications of this character is Chosen of God [Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.25], by Rev. H. W. Lathe. Its title indicates the author's purpose to explain and enforce the doctrine of election. But the volume itself, although dealing with this truth as a keynote, is much broader in scope than the mere title indicates. Into the well of the richest Christian experiences the author has dipped, and pours forth a stream of reflection and suggestion eminently practical and touching human life on many sides. The fact that the Christian is chosen of God is explained, certain kindred truths are considered, and the natural spiritual results are outlined. The high devotional tone of the volume is equaled only by its wise discretion in impressing and enforcing its positions. The author is not promulgating hobbies but seeking to quicken and build up spiritual life in the reader. His teaching is in sympathy with conservative rather than more liberal modern theology but Christians of all schools of faith hardly can fail to derive profit from it.

Dr. A. B. Booth, a well-known contributor to The Expositor and other religious publications, has gathered into a volume, With Open Face [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50], nine of his contributions to that publication, which he has supplemented by some others. They are sketches of the spirit and the teaching of Christ as illustrated in scenes from the evangelists, and the last chapter, entitled The Christian Primer, is a kind of catechism, intended to be used in impressing gospel truth upon the young. The author throughout has exemplified afresh his scholarship and his sincere piety and has put familiar truth in a very fresh and acceptable manner, and not without some suggestions which will strike the reader as new.

The Prophets of the Christian Faith [Macmillan Co. $1 25] contains chapters by Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. Marcus Dods, Canon Fremantle, Professor Harnack, Principal Fairbairn, Dr. Munger, Dean Farrar and others. Dr. Abbott answers the question, What Is a Prophet? and Dean Farrar the question, Can We Be Prophets? And the others discuss such familiar Christian teachers as Isaiah, Paul, St. Augustine, Luther, Jonathan Edwards, Bushnell and Maurice. In a volume made up of contributions from so many different authors, natural diversities of opinion and the results of dissimilar educations result, of course, in statements of truth from individual points of view, but this variety adds to the value of the volume, and all Christian readers will find it exceedingly suggestive and stimulating.——The author of Protestantism [Lee & Shepard. $1.50], Mr. E. P. Usher, is a layman who, having been repelled from the Christian Church by what he considered extravagant and unjustifiable claims, was led to make a careful study of the gospel and to reaccept its essential truths. In this volume he endeavors to set forth the simplicity of original and essential Christianity, and to urge that whoever stands upon the platform thus constructed has the right to Christian recognition. He considers especially the attitude of the Anglican and American Episcopal Churches towards outsiders, but what he has to say is of general significance. His study is reverent and scholarly and undoubtedly embodies an important truth. Whether he fully perceives the strength of the present movement throughout Christianity in the direction of his object certainly is a question. To our thinking he fails to do it justice. But, without necessarily agreeing with everything which his pages contain, the spirit and method of the book may be cordially approved as well as its general aim.

The annual volume of Monday Club Sermons [Cong. S. S. & Pub. Soc. $1.25] deals with its usual series of topics in its usual practical and telling fashion. Its authors, with hardly an exception, have had much experience as pastors and preachers, and the scholarship and felicity displayed in the interpretation of truth and the terse and pithy fashion in which they impress it show that their experience has not failed of its proper results. We have commended their volume year after year, with good reason, and the large audience which it annually addresses will appreciate this issue as much as any of its predecessors.——A Gentle Heart [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 35 cents] is another work by Rev. J. R. Miller, D. D., in which he sets forth with tender earnestness the Christian's duty and privilege of gentleness. It is a little book, simple in arrangement and style but eminently impressive.——From the same pen comes a quite different volume, The Story of a Busy Life [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.00], which contains recollections of Mrs. George A. Paull, somewhat well known through her books, mostly published under her maiden name of Minnie E. Kenney. Her portrait is its frontispiece, and Dr. Miller has written a sympathetic and graphic account of her beautiful and useful life.

Readings for Leisure Moments [H. L. Hastings. $1.50], by the publisher of the book, is a collection of miscellanies of a plain and sometimes homely character such as everybody appreciates, and it abounds in wise suggestions never failing to have a spiritual tendency. It is one of those books which will interest many readers who might not care for the same truth put before them in a more formal manner.——In Three Children of Galilee [Joseph Knight Co. $1.50] John Gordon has composed a life of Christ for young people in the form of a story. It is written simply and feelingly, and is illustrated abundantly and well. It will interest the children successfully and leave abiding impressions.——A new edition of Mr. Ruskin's Letters to the Clergy on the Lord's Prayer and the Church [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.75] has been brought out, edited, with essays and comments, by Rev. F. A. Malleson. This edition, the third, includes some additional letters by Mr. Ruskin and observations upon them by the editor, and it omits some of the letters to Mr. Ruskin formerly inserted. We do not think Mr. Ruskin's opinions upon such subjects specially worthy of great heed, but of course they possess interest. All parties to this discussion speak out frankly, but as almost the whole of what they have to say was said sixteen years ago, and as the conditions of church life in England have altered greatly since then, the book is a resurrection rather than a thing of today.

STORIES.

Mr. F. Marion Crawford's new book, Taquisara [Macmillan Co. $2,00], should more properly have been entitled Gianluca, for the latter, who dies, is much more prominent than the former, who lives and marries the heroine. It is difficult to believe that the treacherousness of the Italian character of 300 years ago survives at the present day to the degree indicated by this story, yet there is no sufficient reason for doubting the entire possibility of such facts as those here narrated. The book is a study of modern Italian character and life, and it deals with the schemings of certain bankrupt and unscrupulous persons to obtain possession of the property, even by murder, if necessary, of a wealthy heiress, and of her love affairs. She is a noble and beautiful character and one hardly knows which to admire most, the vivid pictures of her development, the equally graphic manipulation of events as the intricate plot unravels itself, or the minor but no less powerfully drawn pictures of the life of the time among both high and low. The story is often painful, but always picturesque and striking, and from the artist's point of view it certainly contains some of the author's best work hitherto.

Mr. J. M. Barrie's new book, Sentimental Tommy [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50], is so good that it ought to have been a great deal better. It is too long, and in spite of the fun and pathos and shrewd insight into character and the picturesque photographs, so to speak, of life in London and in Thrums, one finds himself staggered now and then to understand why the movement of the book is so slow and why the interest flags. But this is a trifling objection compared with the introduction into a book sure to be read by boys and girls of one or two characters whose iniquities, although described only suggestively, are treated with an unmistakableness of suggestion which is as objectionable, especially for young readers, as it seems to us to have been unnecessary. To tell the truth about Thrums or any other place does not necessarily mean to tell the whole truth, and it is painful to find a book, in which the signal ability of the author is illustrated so richly and beautifully and in so many different ways, marred by features the omission of which would have weakened the story in no particular, and would have made it far more deserving of admiration. In some respects it is a great book. We never have known the childish imagination, and the innocent and amusing self-deceptions of which it often is the cause, to be depicted with anything like the graphic and complete success attained in these pages, and we could praise them in other particulars at much length. But at best the story is like the statue in Nebuchadnezzar's dream.

The Wheels of Chance [Macmillan Co. $1.50], by H. G. Wells, is a bicycling story, sufficiently absurd to keep the reader smiling, sufficiently truthful, so far as the wheel itself is concerned, to appeal strongly to all cyclers, and fairly entertaining and well written as a mere novel. It is light literature, but decidedly bright and readable.——Green Fire [Harper & Bros. $1.25] is a romance by Fiona Macleod. The author makes a specialty of Celtic subjects and in this book the scene changes from Brittany to the outlaying Scotch islands, and the sturdy quality, as well as the strange imagination and superstition of the people on either side of the channel, give tone to the volume. It is a striking story, chiefly in the minor key but often beautiful and touching. It is unique in some respects and abounds in a peculiar sort of interest. It is written charmingly.——Messrs. Roberts Bros. have published [Little Daughter of the Sun $1 25], by Julia P. Dabney, a story of the Canary Islands which is romantic and graphic, and contains fine studies of individual character. It is short and simple, but not the less agreeable.——Miss Katherine Pearson Woods in The Crowning of Candace [Dodd, Mead & Co. 75 cents], reprints in a volume her story which has been running in the Churchman. It is a volume of the Feather Library. It describes with much spirit the mischievous effect of an early literary success upon an impressionable and imperfectly trained young girl, and her gradual awakening to true views of life and authorship, through her personal romance.

Ouida's well-known novel, Under Two Flags [J. B. Lippincott Co. $3.00], is republished in a handsome two volume edition with a few spirited and well-executed illustrations and the admirers of this well-known author will welcome it in this form.——Camp life often proves to be congenial to romance and in Mr. G. P. Fisher, Jr.'s, pleasant novel, Out of the Woods [McClurg & Co. $1.00], the love story blends with the narrative of hunting, fishing and camp experiences in general very naturally and agreeably. The mystery of the plot is made more of than is necessary under the circumstances, but the story is written excellently and is more than ordinarily entertaining.——The World's Great Snare [Lippincott Co. $1 00], by E. P. Oppenheim, is highly sensational and of a low moral tone, in spite of much which is commendable. It is composed with noticeable spirit and it abounds in movement and incident, but it is too melodramatic and the ideals of life which are suggested are not what they ought to be.

Nephelé [New Amsterdam Book Co. $1 00], by F. W. Bourdillon, is a musical novel, in which the peculiar sensitiveness of musicians to the impressions of sound and to the influences communicable through the manipulation of their instruments are employed to illustrate and intensify a sad yet interesting romance. The book is slight in texture but well written.——Even more mysterious and entertaining, in spite of its daring use of the impossible, is Iras: A Mystery [Harpers. $1.00], by Theo Douglas. When we mention that a revived mummy is the heroine, and that her nineteenth century lover and herself are pursued by the vengeful ghost of an ancient Egyptian priest, whose machinations are too much for them, we indicate the material of the story, which would be unlikely to be much read were it not written in a literary style deserving praise and with careful attention in other respects to the essential qualities of a successful modern novel.

Mr. J. K. Bangs has chosen a novel theme for his story, A Rebellious Heroine [Harpers. $1.25], which is reprinted from Harper's Magazine. The illusion, the heroine being an imaginary person, the leading character in a story written by the hero, is fairly well kept up, but the reader becomes a little confused here and there and the conception, novel though it is, hardly is capable of the use which is made of it. Yet Mr. Bangs has written a bright and entertaining little book and the successive revolts of the heroine afford considerable amusement.——Dutch India has not been wholly overlooked by the novelists in their search for themes, but has been written up comparatively seldom. Annie Lindon, who seems familiar with Java and the surrounding region and with the life of the Dutch Indian, in her story, Gold [Century Co. $1.25], has composed a book more powerful than pleasing. Its delineations of character and life are more than ordinarily successful, and in its latter portion the dramatic and even the tragic abound, but the physical and moral miasma of that part of the world inevitably has too strong an influence over the story. It is impossible to describe the facts truly, we suppose, without dwelling painfully upon the darker side of life.

Vawder's Understudy [Stokes Co. 75 cents], by J. K. Reese, has for a sub-title a Study in Platonic Affection. The material is skillfully handled and the perils of that sort of mutual regard are discussed with considerable adroitness. The story is lively and entertaining. ——The Story of Aaron [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $2 00], by Joel Chandler Harris, illustrated by Oliver Herford, is one of that author's fascinating compositions, and the illustrations are strikingly apt and amusing. The peculiar humor of Mr. Harris finds ample room for display and the book belongs with those as to the popularity of which there can be no doubt.

Cherry and Violet [Scribners. Imported. $2 25], by Miss Manning, an English author, is a tale of the period of the great plague in London. It affords lucid and somewhat picturesque impressions of life at that time among the middle classes in London as well as to some extent in the country, and its account of the fearful pestilence is the more telling because of its simplicity. The book is printed with some attempt to imitate the ancient manner, and the illustrations by John Jellicoe and Herbert Rialton are natural as well as spirited and admirable in their appropriateness. The book is more than ordinarily attractive.——In Jean P. Rudd's The Tower of the Old Schloss [Putnams. $1.25] the most conspicuous feature is that the German peasants talk broad Scotch for the most part, occasionally throwing in a word of German as if to remind themselves of their nationality. Too many German words are introduced in the conversations generally. The best feature is the impression which the book gives of life in the old Schloss, not very inviting at the best. The characters are not drawn with the utmost skill, and there is little of interest in the plot.——The most recent issue in the Messrs. Harpers' current edition of Thomas Hardy's novels is Under the Greenwood Tree [$1.50], which is a strikingly picturesque and amusing portrayal of rustic life in southern England, and into which nobody but the farmers and people of their general quality are introduced except the parish parson.——Philippa [Lippincott Co. $1.25], by Mrs. Molesworth, is on the border line between novels and stories for the young. It is a love story, but the experiences of the young heroine are eminently juvenile in some respects, and the reader receives suggestions of moral and social value. The author has handled her material with her usual skill and the girls will uniformly approve the story as being both delightful and sensible.

A Christian commercial traveler is the hero of Quaint Crippen [McClurg & Co. $1.00], by A. M. Thurber. The romance in the narrative comes to its crisis with unlikely rapidity, and in some other respects the story indicates a measure of inexperience in the author. But its main purpose—the portrayal of a commercial traveler who is an earnest and helpful Christian without ceasing to be in a real and active sense a man of the world—is well carried out. ——Mr. H. T. Coates has made a collection of stories, some of which are familiar, others fresh and all interesting, which are gathered into a tasteful edition, in three volumes, bearing the title Fireside Stories Old and New [H. T. Coates & Co. Each $1 00]. The selections are diversified and entertaining.——Max and Zan and Nicodemus [W. J. Shuey. 75 cents] is by Mrs. M. A. H. Fisher. It is a Tennessee story, slight in texture, but affording distinct and varied pictures of the life of the region. It has considerable interest.——Mary E. Bradley has undertaken to set forth some wholesome moral and religious teachings in Friends for Good [American S. S. Union. $1 25], one of the most prominent of which is the untrustworthiness of modern spiritualism, and the fact that much deception is connected with its so-called manifestations. The story is eventful and maintains interest fairly well without deserving to be awarded the highest literary praise.

JUVENILE.

Amanda M. Douglas in A Little Girl of Old New York [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50] has taken for her theme the experiences of a child in what really was not so very long ago, but is rapidly passing into ancient history—the time of the Polk and Clay presidential campaign. In spite of occasional permission of unlikely speech the author has written a capital book, full of vivacious narrative and successfully portraying the life of well-to-do people in the New York city of the period. Their amusements, employments, views and characteristics are brought out effectively and the tone and atmosphere of their society are suggested successfully. In a certain sense the book has a value as a historical study. It is also very readable ——Above the Range [Wilde & Co. $1.25], by Theodora R. Jenness, a story for girls, is somewhat out of the common order. It deals with life in a Government school for Indians in the Northwest and its heroines are chiefly the pupils. The superstitions and temptations of the young Indian girls, their sports, their studies and the general character of the life which goes on in such a place have furnished the author with material which seldom, if ever, before has been handled in so fresh and striking a manner. The story is interesting throughout, points many sound morals and is natural, life-like and high-toned. We commend it heartily.——A Little Girl of Long Ago [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.00], by Eliza Orne White, is tempting to look at and engrossing to read. It tells of certain little British children who found their way to America many years ago and who lived in Boston, and they and the life of their day among children are described very pleasantly. The author introduces the present to the past, to the delight of the modern reader, with more than common success.

Two or three new issues of the Congregational Publication Society illustrate the good judgment with which the managers of our denominational organization are carrying on their work. One is The Rockanock Stage [$1.50], by Prof. George Huntington. It is an exciting and almost sensational story, yet wholesome and uplifting. It abounds in action and the boys and girls will agree that it entertains to the end. But they will get more than entertainment out of it, and the author's genial humor and his skill in enforcing truth indirectly as well as pointedly will secure for it as it becomes known many readers who no longer are boys or girls.——Another of their books is The Young Mandarin [$1.50], by Rev. J. A. Davis. China is its scene, and the Chinese for the most part are its characters. The author's long experience and wide knowledge of that country have enabled him to draw an evidently truthful and characteristic picture of Chinese life and thought not often given to the public. The hero of the book is a genuine Chinaman, not one constructed by the imperfectly enlightened foreign imagination. The many and striking peculiarities of Chinese life give zest and naturalness to the narrative. The Christian tone of the book is noticeable, yet there is no attempt to parade missions or the success of Christianity unduly. Such a story is for old as well as young and has more than the value of a merely interesting narrative. It is a picture of society and of a society which appears to be on the eve of significant changes.

From the same publishers comes also The Rainproof Invention [$1.50], by Emily Weaver. The importance of integrity in business and the value of loyalty to high ideals are here enforced in a graphic and even engrossing narrative, which deals with some not uncommon episodes in human life with good judgment and good results.——One more story from the same publishers is The Poole's Millions [$1.50], by Julia McNair Wright. Money is not everything or even the greatest thing in life, and Mrs. Wright in enforcing this truth so zealously and by teaching incidentally certain kindred lessons about the true way to regard life and the education of the young would have done excellent service even if she had not rendered it in a form so attractive as this pleasant story. Her reputation requires good work, but these pages will not lessen her hold upon her readers.——Chilhowee Boys at College [Crowell & Co. $1.50], by Sarah G. Morrison, describes the earlier struggles of the young heroes to secure an education. The characters, who are familiar to many readers, are carried through a series of experiences, through which their friends will accompany them with unfailing attention, and suggestions of high manhood and self-improvement are made at once forceful and judiciously. The book will be as popular as its predecessors.

There are a great many boys and girls in Malvern [Wilde & Co. $1 50], by Ellen D. Deland, and they are good, bad and indifferent and get into scrapes and out of them again, and go to the World's Fair and home again and are genuine boys and girls throughout who have, for the most part, a wholesome desire to be good and to do good, and yet who are as far as possible from being prigs. Their story is told very brightly, and some capital pictures, by Alice B. Stephens, help to make it all real. The book will not lack readers.——With equal good will and conviction it is possible to commend The Boys of Clovernook [Lothrop Co. $1.50], by Mrs. Mary B. Beal. Five youngsters on a farm seem to think of and attempt about everything which bright boys can be conceived of as suggesting to each other, and the history of their experiences is lively indeed. The boys, and many a girl also, will read it with zest.——It is the Creole world in Louisiana to which Mrs. Mary T. Earle introduces the reader in The Wonderful Wheel [Century Co. $1.25], and the superstition of the people, the ostracizing of the innocent hero and heroine, the revulsion of public feeling created by their unselfishness form the body of the story which is all the more delightful for the delicate skill with which the local color is applied. It is a sweet little story, unpretending, but full of real power and pathos.

It is not a large book, but it is a very delightful one which tells of Adolph, and How He Found the "Beautiful Lady" [Revell Co. 50 cents]. Fannie J. Taylor wrote it, and Heléne Toerring has added some superior pictures. It is a beautiful, ennobling little story of childish simplicity and faith and their influence. It will do every reader good. ——A somewhat older boy and a boy worth reading about, a real boy also and one whose history is sure to interest his fellow boys and girls, is Dick [Crowell & Co. $1.25], described by Anna C. Ray. The book will not fail of its share of public favor.——Still another interesting boy is the hero of J. Cole [Crowell & Co. $1.00], by Emma Gellibrand. This one is a page in a lady's household, and his honorable ambitions and zealous efforts to realize them, the naturalness of his development and the pathos of portions of his history all combine to make him a more than commonly attractive hero.

Captain Chap, or The Rolling Stone [Lippincott Co. $1 00], by F. R. Stockton, is one of his stories of incident and adventure, written some fifteen years ago for young people and now reissued with illustrations by C. H. Stephens. The boy who looks at the pictures will anticipate excitement while reading the text and will not fail to find it. It does not seem to us to represent the author's high water mark of excellence, but it is a book which the boys will enjoy.——Very much the same sort of literature is illustrated by A Medal of Honor Man [Wilde & Co. $1.25], by C. L. Norton. It is one of the Fighting for the Flag series and is a sequel to the opening volume. The hero undergoes many startling experiences in cruising among blockade runners and contributing his services to the suppression of the contraband trade during the late War of the Rebellion. The author knows how to make a strong book for young readers and has done so here.

We might say the same thing of J. M. Oxley, author of The Boy Tramps [Crowell & Co. $1.50]. His heroes undertake to cross the American continent along the general line of the Canadian Pacific Railroad and most of the way on foot. They meet with many startling and interesting experiences, which the author's familiarity with the region described and his skill as a graphic narrator have enabled him to render entertaining to the reader. ——It is many years since Captain Mayne Reid achieved his popularity as a writer for boys, and his Young Voyageurs [Putnams. $1.25] are his famous boy hunters carried into the Northern regions and caused to undergo adventures and to acquire knowledge, which the reader may share with them by his fireside yet with an interest almost equal to theirs. The publishers are issuing a "Nimrod" edition of Captain Reid's stories, and this will help to revive his extensive and long enduring popularity.

Col. T. W. Knox takes his readers this year to Australia, and his annual volume of travel and adventure is entitled The Land of the Kangaroo [Wilde & Co. $1.50]. It embodies more information of a practical quality than most books of that sort, so that it has solid value, yet it is none the less entertaining. It deserves to be one of the first favorites of the year with the boys and girls, the former especially, and is a capital book in all respects. ——David Ker is one of the most successful among modern writers for the older children. His new book, Swept Out to Sea [Lippincott Co. $1.50], is full of incident and adventure, and also abounds in stimulus toward all that is manly and good. It is a story which the boys will read with exceptional eagerness, and many of their elders, if they pick it up, will once more become boyish enough to conclude it.——Four Young Explorers, or Sight Seeing in the Tropics [Lee & Shepard. $1 25] is Oliver Optic's latest. Of course the author gives rein to his fancy and the reader may depend upon a succession of adventures which are often thrilling but which result satisfactorily.——Readers of Beautiful Joe and the author's other writings will welcome For the Other Boys' Sake, and Other Stories [C. H. Banes. $1 00], by Marshall Saunders. It includes nearly a dozen short stories, all of them well planned and executed, spirited in style, elevated in sentiment and full of genuine human interest. Some illustrations add to the attractiveness of the volume.——Ouida, whose real name is Louise de la Ramé, in Two Little Wooden Shoes [Lippincott Co. $1 25] has done much better work than in most of her more elaborate novels. It is a gracefully and tenderly written story for children, the scene of which is in Belgium, the actors being peasants, and the interest of which increases from page to page throughout.——The concluding volume of the Hazlewood series, by Grace LeBaron Upham, is The Rosebud Club [Lee & Shepard. 75 cents]. It is a bright and entertaining little story of juvenile life here and abroad, and the many readers of its predecessors will welcome it enthusiastically.

Fairy Tales Far and Near [Stokes Co. $1.50] have been retold by Q., who is understood to be Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, and who knows well how to render the familiar and graphic old narratives additionally quaint and amusing by his skillful handling. He has done superior work in these pages, and the children will unconsciously, but none the less really, appreciate its quality. H. R. Millar has supplied good illustrations.——Nathaniel Hawthorne's Wonder Book for Girls and Boys [75 cents] has been tastefully reprinted by Messrs. Crowell & Co., and may be depended upon to retain its place in the literature of the imagination for years to come—a place firmly established and willingly conceded.——From the Macmillan Co. comes Mabel O. Wright's Tommy-Anne and the Three Hearts [$1.50], and considerable ingenuity has been exhibited by the author in carrying out the conception that animals, trees and plants are the companions of the little heroine who has no girls or boys with whom to play. The young reader will gain a good deal of information about nature and the story is a sort of connecting link between common life and fairy land, with much of the charm of each. It is illustrated amply and well, and it will enliven the winter for many a reader.

The Book of Wonder Voyages [Macmillan Co. $1.50], edited by Joseph Jacobs, with illustrations by J. D. Battan, is the outgrowth of the editor's custom of story telling in his own home. In these pages the narratives of the Argonauts, the voyage of Melduin, Hasan of Bassorah and the journey of Thorkill and of Eric the Far Traveled are related afresh and with an excellent understanding of how to hold the interest of the reader. The young people will give the volume a cordial welcome.——The Dwarfs' Tailor, and Other Fairy Tales [Harpers. $1.75], collected by Zoe D. Underhill, is another admirable collection. One would like to go back for a time to childhood, were it possible, in order to enjoy these stories afresh, as used to be possible. The addition of spirited full-page illustrations increases the charm of the book.——The Macmillan Co. also have issued a pretty little collection of Tales from Hans Andersen [$1.00]. The familiar stories reappear here in a tasteful and even dainty form, and Helen Stratton's pretty illustrations deserve high praise. ——Messrs. Estes & Lauriat have brought out in the customary form their Chatterbox [$1.25] for 1896. It is sure of its favorable reception and it abundantly deserves it. The illustrative work is as well done as it is abundant. The colored pictures are especially good.

POETRY.

Dr. M. C. Hazard has rendered the Christian public a valuable service by compiling his collection of poems on heaven, which the Congregational Publishing Society has just issued under the title The Tearless Land [$1.50]. The literature of the subject is, of course, extensive even in verse, and the problem what to include and what to omit is not easily solved. But Dr. Hazard has exhibited an enlightened discrimination, not refusing to approve a poem comparatively unknown if meritorious, nor feeling called upon to include a poem well known but undeserving. We recollect no collection of the sort which, on the whole, contains so much we are glad to possess and so little which we would cast away. Indeed, we are not sure that we would omit a single poem. For one or another reason the presence of each seems essential. The book is a constant treat to the Christian reader. Sentimentalism is absent, but it abounds in the loftiest sentiment, genuine, strong and uplifting. A great variety of meter is illustrated and the best authors of the past and present are represented. The truest poetry and the profoundest spirituality blend with each other throughout its pages. It is handsomely issued and will make a popular Christmas present.

The poems of C. E. D. Phelps are of more than common excellence, as is proved in Echoes from the Mountain [Putnams. $1 00]. Some of them have appeared in our own or other journals, and in one or another way they illustrate insight into nature and character and a considerable power of expression. The book is not large, but the reader of it finds himself disposed to meditate as he reads and to regard the author as penetrating somewhat deeper than many of his fellow-craftsmen into the secrets of both nature and human nature —— Songs of Exile [Copeland & Day. 75 cents], by Herbert Bates, is the title of a collection of short poems which are issued in an exceptionally dainty fashion, and which also illustrate sincere poetic feeling and a metrical power which, if sometimes less polished than it might be, does not lack vigor or grace. Poems of nature abound, and the author is a sympathetic interpreter.

The quaint cover of The Quilting Bee and Other Rhymes [Stokes Co. $1.00], by J. L. Heaton, catches the eye, and the homely, everyday quality of the poems holds his attention when the book is opened. There is considerable difference in the quality of the author's verses but they average well and are adapted to interest readers who do not care for the profounder suggestions of the poetical mind, but appreciate the practical and genial suggestions of the light-hearted and sensible singer whose songs ripple pleasantly in their ears and enliven common life as they know it. ——The poetry of the South, in distinction from poetry in general, hardly has had justice done it in the past and Mr. Joel Chandler Harris's intimation that no anthology of the kind ever has been produced until now probably is correct. But in Songs of the South [Lippincott Co. $1 50], by Jennie T. Clarke, this lack has been supplied. She has gathered a choice collection of the best work of representative poets throughout the South and the result is a characteristic and pleasing volume. Many of the authors are of hardly more than local reputation, but the work of selection has been done skillfully and the Southern atmosphere permeates the book agreeably but not oppressively. In an appendix biographical notes are supplied, and Northern readers as well as those born in the South will read the volume with genuine and lasting interest.

Mr. T. B. Aldrich's familiar poem, Friar Jerome's Beautiful Book [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], has been reissued with decorations by W. S. Hadaway. It is unique in respect to these illustrations and the spirit of the poem has been caught with unusual success by the designer. It is a volume not to be overlooked when the Christmas list is being selected.——From Avalon and Other Poems [McClurg & Co. $1.00] is by Emily Huntington Miller. Her verse is of superior quality and noticeably even in excellence, although very various in form and subject. She excels especially in what may be called the suggestive side of poetry. The reader finds himself not only engrossed for the time being, but set to reflecting. Some of the poems of this collection are peculiarly tender and touching.

A volume of Songs for Little People [Macmillan Co. $2.00], by Norman Gale, offers poetry to young, but not the youngest, children, although we are not sure that it is necessary to limit the range of its probable readers in either direction. It is a bright, entertaining series of poems just suited to the children, and its illustrations, which appear on every page, are in perfect keeping with the verses which they set off.——The Macmillan Co. have put upon the market a new edition of The Poetical Works of Robert Browning [$3 50]. It is in two volumes and is complete. The chronological order has been observed so far as possible, exceptions being made only as the poet himself had formerly made them. Augustine Birrell has edited it and the edition will receive ready recognition.

HOLIDAY BOOKS.

Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have almost outdone themselves, if that were possible, in their holiday edition of Thoreau's Cape Cod [$5 00]. It is in two volumes, illustrated throughout from sketches in color by Amelia M. Watson. The cape dwellings and scenery have been reproduced with fidelity and grace and the well-known text has an additional charm, hardly to be appreciated until the volumes are examined, in the method of illustration adopted.——The Surrey Edition, in two volumes, of Washington Irving's Bracebridge Hall [$6 00], which Messrs. Putnam's Sons have issued is conspicuous among gift books. Daintily printed and elegantly bound, each page is adorned with a handsome ornamental border and the illustrations, whether small or large, are examples of delicate and skillful work. It would be difficult to devise a more beautiful edition for the price, and the price, in fact, seems low.——John Dennie's Rome of Today and Yesterday [Putnam's. $4 00] has reached its third edition. All who are familiar with the famous city will appreciate the historical, archæological and artistic merit of the volume, and we recommend it to all intending visitors to Rome, although some previous knowledge of history and architecture on their part is desirable if its great excellence is to be fully appreciated. It is illustrated with nearly threescore reproductions of photographs. The charm of Rome endures and its historic interest increases as additional explorations and excavations bring forth new disclosures out of its past, and this beautiful volume, packed with information and abounding in interest, should go into every public library and every considerable private library in the country.

Rustic Life in France [Crowell & Co. $2 50], which Helen B. Dole has translated from the French of André Theuriet and which Léon Lhermitte has illustrated, is delightful for its graphic and faithful revelations of common life among the farmers in France. The author has made close and successful study of the peasants and their daily routine of existence, of their home life as well as their out-of-door doings, their worship and other religious observances, their betrothals and weddings and all matters of interest in their lives. The pictures are well executed and pleasantly enlivening and the book is handsomely printed and bound.——Mr. Clifton Johnson, who has done so much excellent work in our own columns, has gathered into a pretty volume several papers published in this journal or elsewhere, with others, and has illustrated them lavishly and well with photographs which he personally has taken. The result is called A Book of Country Clouds and Sunshine [Lee & Shepard. $2.50]. It will be appreciated highly, not only by residents in the country, but perhaps even more by those who, of country birth and training, have come to the great cities and there have become established. It is a New England book, but the nature and the human nature in it know no territorial lines.——A new edition of William Winter's Gray Days and Gold [Macmillan Co. $2 50] continues for the benefit of readers of today the delight which others have felt for several years past. The author describes experiences and scenes of literary, historical, social or other interest in England or Scotland, and his facile pen, itself sufficient to reproduce and interpret, receives aid from the presence of many admirable photographs and other illustrations, and all combine to make one of the most beautiful and rewarding books of the season.

Dr. A. S. Twombly has employed a portion of his recent leisure in writing The Masterpieces of Michelangelo and Milton [Silver, Burdett & Co. $1.50], a delightful and somewhat notable study of the chief characteristics of these two great men. The first part, devoted to Michelangelo, points out that his chief statues or frescoes mark four distinct periods in his development. The second part analyzes Milton's theory of life, as revealed in Paradise Lost, and the robustness and supremacy of each in his own sphere, and their striking mutual resemblances in some points of character and service are indicated. The essays are admirable examples of keen analysis, impartial judgment, sympathetic description and literary finish. And the illustrations, all of which are full-page, are excellent reproductions of some of the famous paintings or historic statues which the subject suggests. Each study possesses exceptional value in its own way and they combine naturally and make a somewhat unusual volume. The publishers have issued it in a commendably tasteful form and we commend it to those seeking holiday gifts.

MISCELLANEOUS.

If the American Mrs. Ward has written anything more delightful than Chapters from a Life [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], which with an evident propriety, inasmuch as the larger part of it relates to her earlier life, she has issued under her maiden name, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, we do not recall it. Autobiography is difficult, but she has known what to say and how to say it, and especially to any one familiar with the Andover of twenty-five or more years ago the book gives a rich and peculiar pleasure. The portrayal of heredity and its influence, the glimpses of domestic and social life, the account of her development as an author, the description of her work as a reformer among the fishing people in Gloucester, whom she loves so dearly and deservedly, the glimpses afforded of her intercourse with Holmes, Whittier, Celia Thaxter, Lucy Larcom, James T. Fields and others, and the views of life in general and its opportunities which the book presents—all these, both in themselves and as factors in the composite whole, unite to make the result one of the most readable and stimulating among recent volumes of the sort. It leaves lasting and powerful impressions. Many portraits and other appropriate pictures add to its enjoyableness.

Mrs. Annie Fields's charming book, Authors and Friends [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50], introduces the reader afresh to Longfellow, Emerson, Holmes, Whittier, Tennyson, Mrs. Stowe and Mrs. Thaxter, and causes them to become genuine friends, if that were necessary, in a real and vivid sense. Mrs. Fields's opportunities and her rare charm of authorship need no comment now. We only say that they who have not seen her book will find in it a literary atmosphere of the most invigorating and delightful quality and much in the way of incidental anecdote and characterization to miss which would be a distinct loss.——Mr. E. Boyd Smith, author of My Village [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00], appears to be an American artist who lives in Paris, and spends his summers in the quaint and fascinating country on the seacoast of France. In this book he has made minute and appreciative studies of many aspects of village life, sometimes repeating himself, but never to the reader's regret, catching successfully the inward as well as the external peculiarities of the peasantry and reproducing them with vivid delineations. Illustrations abound and they also are his own and are remarkably expressive and entertaining. The scope of the book is narrow, but within its chosen range it is a superior piece of work.——The Happy Life [T. Y. Crowell & Co. 35 cents] is a book for young people by President Eliot of Harvard University, and is wise and stimulating, brimming with the practical good sense so characteristic of the author and written in a forcible manner. It is so short that it will be read when a longer treatise would be neglected, and so excellent that it will be remembered when much of equal value but less judiciously expressed would be disregarded.——From the same publishers comes a similar little volume, Culture and Reform [35 cents], by Anna R. Brown, Ph.D. It goes deeply below the surface of life and yet is highly readable and is shrewd, practical and Christian throughout.

Mr. G. T. Woglom has written a volume on the making and flying of tailless kites which he entitles Parakites [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25]. The many recent references to kites of this sort in the daily newspapers have taught people that such kites are of great assistance in scientific research, and this treatise undertakes to set forth the experiences of the writer in connection with them and the results of their use so far as results have been obtained. The book is necessarily technical to a considerable extent, yet is not difficult to be understood and is of great interest to specialists in some lines. It is handsomely printed and is illustrated.——Old Colony Days [Roberts Bros. $1.25], by May A. Ward, is an addition to the rapidly increasing literature relating to the colonial period of our history. Its successive chapters deal with the Father of American History, the Early Autocrat of New England, Some Delusions of Our Forefathers, and kindred subjects. It is historically accurate in the main, although an occasional slip may be noted, and it is a loyal and sympathetic portrayal of Pilgrim and Puritan character and life. It contains nothing which has not been narrated by others, but it has its own charm and makes a fair claim upon public notice.

A delightful book of travel is The Edge of the Orient [Scribners. $2.00], by R. H. Russell. Seeking out of the way regions, the author enjoyed many experiences of travel in the east of Europe and the west of Asia which were comparatively novel and which he has described with zest and literary felicity. An abundance of choice photographs of an unusually high quality adds reality to the other attractiveness of the book, which certainly is one of the most tempting volumes of travel recently issued.——Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney has so large a public, especially among young girls, that such a book as Friendly Talks with Girl Friends [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1 25], is certain of a wide reading. Already issued in the columns of the Ladies' Home Journal, these chapters hardly need an introduction to the public, but it is as pleasant as it is needless to add that the volume is rich in wise and Christian suggestions which every one must appreciate.

Mr. E. L. Godkin probably is one of the most influential of modern American essayists. Within the last thirty years he has published many papers of weight in the leading reviews, and a number of these now have been collected into a volume, The Problems of Modern Democracy [Scribners. $2.00]. Among them are those on The Expenditures of Rich Men, which came out in Scribner's Magazine last October, and that entitled, Who Will Pay the Bills of Socialism? which caused considerable comment when it appeared in the Forum in June, 1894. Other themes are the Duties of Educated Men in the Democracy, the Real Problems of Democracy, Criminal Politics, etc. Mr. Godkin is a strong and fearless thinker and possesses a terse, impressive style, which adds much to the effect of what he has to say. The volume has interest and value sure to endure for a long time.——The fourth volume of the Writings of Thomas Paine [Putnams. $1.50], collected and edited by Moncure D. Conway, completes the series which the editor has been giving to the public. In this volume are included the Age of Reason, an autobiographical sketch and considerable other material of more or less public interest, and an appendix supplies additional papers and poems. The work is issued, of course, in the same substantial and handsome form as its predecessors.

Marion Harland and her daughter, Mrs. Herrick, having had long experience in housewifery and in authorship and even in the preparation of cookery books, have combined in the compilation of The National Cook Book [Scribners. $1.50], a substantial and well-printed volume with a very comprehensive index and with directions under each heading which are the fruit of practical experience, and are expressed with a clearness not always equaled in books of the sort. The rivalry among cook-books seems to be intense, but this one certainly deserves to be well received and undoubtedly will make its own way as it comes to be known. It ought to become a household companion in many families.——The 250th anniversary of the First Church of Christ in Old Saybrook, Conn. [G. W. Dennison. $1.00], was celebrated on the first of last July. The transactions of that eventful day have been described in an interesting volume, and the historical review therein contained, by Rev. A. S. Chesebrough, and the contributions of others in one form or another to the work are of the usual interest and importance. The more such volumes the better.

NOTES.

—— Mrs. Humphry Ward has just raised the funds for a Passmore Edwards House, similar to Toynbee Hall, which is to be erected in the Bloomsbury region of London.

—— Many unpublished manuscripts of the late Sir Richard Burton still remain. There are said to be among them materials for seven or eight books, one of which is almost ready for publication.

—— The many readers of Miss Alice French's —"Octave Thanet's"—writings will regret to learn of her recent loss by the burning of her winter residence, at Elmwood, Ark., involving the destruction of her valuable library.

—— A memorial in honor of the late H. C. Bunner is proposed. His friends are raising $1,000 to provide a gold medal as an annual prize to the student of Columbia University who writes the best essay on some subject connected with American literature.

—— Messrs. Stone & Kimball, the publishers, lately started a new evening journal in New York, the Daily Tatler, somewhat similar to the St. James Gazette of London. But after thirteen issues had appeared it was discontinued—because its success promised to be so great that its editors could not take time to attend to it! A new paper for children, to be called The Great Round World, also is projected by W. B. Harrison, the specialty of which is to be relating the important news of the week to its young readers in the story form.

—— A number of leading men and women in San Francisco, who are not authors but desire to promote the interests of literature, have taken a unique step in forming the San Francisco Guild of Letters. It is primarily a business organization for the purpose of encouraging letters in general and especially of promoting the sale of California publications. It even proposes in some cases to secure the issue of books by Californian writers. In fact it already has done this in the case of Miss Ina D. Coolbrith's poems, and has been justified by the success of the venture.

YOUR LAST CHANCE! POSITIVELY LIMITED TO DEC. 24.

Never will there be another special offer made on this great Standard Dictionary and Encyclopædia of all the world's knowledge. This is positively the last chance you will ever have to secure the work on such extremely liberal terms.
